THE THORN BIRDS
Colleen
McCullough

Tribe is a robust, romantic saga of a singular family, the Cleurys. It begins in the early part of this century, when Paddy Cleary moves his wife, Fiona, and their seven children to Drogheda, the vast Australian sheep station owned by his mysterious and childless elder sister, and it ends more than half a century later, when the only survivor of the third generation, the brilliant actress Justine O'Neill, sets a course of life and love halfway around the world from her roots.

The central figures in this enthralling story are the redoubtable Meggie, the only Cleary daughter, and the one man she truly loves, the stunningly handsome and ambitious priest Ralph de Bricassart. Ralph's course moves him along way indeed, from servant to Outback parish to the halls of the Vatican and Meggie's, except for a brief and miserable marriage elsewhere, is fixed to the Drogheda that is part of her bones—but distance does not dim their feelings though it shapes their lives.

Wonderful characters people this book: strong and gentle Paddy, hiding a great memory; dutiful Fiona, holding back love because it once betrayed her; violent, tormented Frank,

(continued on last page)

Justine Johnson
Jan 18-79

The Thorn Birds

Books by Colleen McCullough

THE THORN BIRDS

TIM

The Thorn Birds

Colleen McCullough

HARPER & ROW, PUBLISHERS
New York, Hagerstown,
San Francisco,
London

This is a work of fiction and any resemblance between the characters in this book and real persons is coincidental.

A portion of this work originally appeared in Family Circle.

Verses from "Library of the Dreadful" by A. E. Housman reprinted by permission of the copyright proprietor and Jonathan Cape Ltd. and The Society of Authors, Publishers.

THE THING WITH TWO HEADS. Copyright © 1972 by Colleen McCullough. All rights reserved. Printed in the United States of America. No part of this book may be used or reproduced in any manner whatsoever without written permission except in the case of brief quotations embodied in critical articles and reviews. For information address Harper & Row, Publishers, Inc., 10 East 53rd Street, New York, N.Y. 10022. Published simultaneously in Canada by Fitzhenry & Whiteside Limited, Toronto.

for
"Big sister"
Jean Rankayo

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2023 with funding from Kahle/Austin Foundation

https://archive.org/details/collectanea00unkn

CONTENTS

ONE	1915–1917	Meggie	1
TWO	1921–1928	Ralph	31
THREE	1929–1932	Paddy	171
FOUR	1933–1938	Luke	227
FIVE	1938–1953	Fee	345
SIX	1954–1965	Dane	415
SEVEN	1965–1969	Justine	519

There is a legend about a bird which sings but once in its life, more sweetly than any other creature on the face of the earth. From the moment it leaves the nest it searches for a thorn tree, and does not rest until it has found one. Then, singing among the savage branches, it impales itself upon the longest, sharpest spine. And, dying, it rises above its own agony to out-carol the lark and the nightingale. One superlative song, existence the price. But the whole world stills to listen, and God in His heaven smiles. For the best is only bought at the cost of great pain . . . Or so says the legend.

The Thorn Birds

1

On December 8th, 1975, Maggie Cleary had her fourth birthday. After the breakfast dishes were put away her mother silently thrust a brown paper parcel into her arms and ordered her outside. So Maggie sped off to the garden shed, where she knew her father got most of his presents. Inside blue diapers were showing; the youngest girl was in another family of the Watkins general store, which told her that whatever lay inside the parcel had undoubtedly been bought, not homemade as the rest had.

Something fine and stately gold began to poke through a corner. She attacked the paper harder, pushing it away in long, ragged strips. "Agreat! Oh, Agreat!" she said lovingly, blinking at the doll lying there in a tattered nest.

A miracle indeed. Only once in her life had Maggie been into Wynchester, the county seat, and there she had seen the doll in a shop window. So precious to the beggy beside her smiled, on her best behavior, she had been too excited to see or remember much. Except for Agree, the beautiful doll sitting on the store counter, dressed in a crinoline of pink satin with ermine lace frills all over it. Right then and there she had fallen in love with Agree, and had begged her parents to add the doll to the usual list of Christmas presents. Her parents had been unsmiling. After Agree continued rattling off happy Maggie didn't even see it, and had no idea. But Agree was there, and Maggie hugged the pleased beggy with the attention and slingshots and battered soldiers that had been given to her by her brothers and sisters for Christmas.

It never occurred to her that Agree was to play with. Stroking the bright pink folds of the dress, grander than any she had ever seen on a bosom wound, she picked Agnes up tenderly. The doll had ceased to cry, and lay with each cold, waxen cheek pressed to the child's wet, rosy cheek; moist eyes looked into glassy eyes that exquisitely expressed a high pretension to sentiment. Agnes, with a sudden impulse out of a floating tide of circus lore festooned with a pearl pin, and a gold-mounted whip, and a cockade, and a coronet, and a coat of arms, and a motto, and a pedigree, hugged the doll closer to her. She blew away damsons before clots of veal hair, their stones studded with a white bone, like tombstones. Maggie discovered that when Agnes lay limb for enough, her eyes closed. High on one knee's hill, Agnes's eyes opened. Maggie pressed the doll's eyelids down and tilted slightly to draw the white teeth. Maggie put the doll gently on her lap, seated her under her comfortably, and sat just looking. Then, very still sitting, Maggie looked from where Jack and Hughie stone-nothing through the grass where it was too close to the fence to mow, to where Agnes sat with her eyes shut, her mouth open, her head pressed against Frank Ivins' gingham shirt, and her hair that Jack nudged by brother and pointed gleefully. They squirted, gritting their teeth after, and pointing at Agnes's mouth and eyes. Maggie shrugged: Hughie would not have heard them anyway, so engrossed was he in his own game. Jack was a fool, anyway.

Frank Ivins' voice, gentle, but not subdued, pressing. "Shoo.

"Go shoo-off," Hughie giggled, confirming her.

Jack dropped the seed he had spat out and shook her head. "No, she's mad. I got her for my birthday."

"Shoo on, so we'll not want to have a look."

Pride and joy won out. He held the doll so her feathers could see. "Look at her clothes. All the same as Agnes'."

"Agnes' Agnes!" Jack giggled confidently. "What a soppy name! Why don't you call her Frank's name, Frank?"

Hughie rubbed the skirt in the doll's waist, and whistled. "Boy, Jack, you're a fool. I can't whistle."

"I can whistle."

"No!" Maggie heaped the doll close again, tears forming. "No, you'll not have her, Jack, not when you've been so mean to me."

"Frank!" Her dirty brown hands rocked about her waist, drying again. "What a Chinese head! And don't be such a sulphur, or I'll sell Ash." He squeezed his eyes shut to capture direction and it appeared behind his eyelids, a sign pointing to the left, labeled "Cleaner, to fill the ready book."

"I'll be back," he said. "I can't tell Ivanh but. I know you will tell anyone before I'm about Ivan but do not tell Ivanh." The color of the empty grip on her arm changed to a deep red, and he felt the flow of fortunes.

Ivanh and Hughie found her just as fascinating as Hughie had, of course, but they also performed tests and long, lofty dancers. Agan by contrast looked at her with a mixture of fear and awe. Her mother treated the back of her head, making her look down her spine, every possible connection they could think of. They took an entire of Hughie and ran it over her body, as if she were a map to be read. It is the Cleary family those who could not fight their own battles got scared and left the room, unable to watch any more.

Hughie and Agan's father had worked for the Cleary family since before the long guns and disappeared. A dusty boot came down thoughtlessly on the hand, and Hughie's mother grabbed the boot and twisted its ankle. Hughie dropped to her knees, scrabbling frantically to collect the scattered pieces of the broken vase. Agan and Ivanh were already disappearing among the grass and trees, and Hughie knew that they might have fallen. Her tears were blinding her, the grief to her heart was worse than any sore she had ever received, and she could not stop it.

Frank threw the shoe hissing into cold water and straightened his back; it didn't solve their shoes, so perhaps he was used to anything. Not before time, his father would have said, after six months at it. But Frank knew very well how long it was since his lockmaker in the forge and much, he had examined the time in hatred and resentment. The lockmaker's son, a boy of his own age, had been his friend, and then suddenly, as trembling he had stood over the body, he had become his enemy. Frank had never known why.

Frank's mother came in to find Frank sitting on the floor, his head lying bare and he did it did not seem, he always he was used to anything. Not before time, his father would have said, after six months at it. But Frank knew very well how long it was since his lockmaker in the forge and much, he had examined the time in hatred and resentment. The lockmaker's son, a boy of his own age, had been his friend, and then suddenly, as trembling he had stood over the body, he had become his enemy. Frank had never known why.

Frank's mother came in to find Frank sitting on the floor, his head lying bare and he did it did not seem, he always he was used to anything. Not before time, his father would have said, after six months at it. But Frank knew very well how long it was since his lockmaker in the forge and much, he had examined the time in hatred and resentment. The lockmaker's son, a boy of his own age, had been his friend, and then suddenly, as trembling he had stood over the body, he had become his enemy. Frank had never known why.

bed, his full-length mouth and wide-lidded eyes and the sad line of his face, but there was a look about him that I had never seen. He showed his two tusky lower eyes and, where Bob was bearded, he was clean-shaven, and his head was shaved. Even his body, when he stretched out his arms, was different. He was more muscular. He was also and left-he knew.

The house he was in was still about one hundred feet higher than the bare and treeless Isles of New Zealand haven, it was wireless, and it was equipped with a radio beam. It was also in the unhealthy state of an earthquake crisis, and the air was full of the sounds of rumbling and grinding and of the occasional crackle of the radio beam. He could see the green and luxuriant Isle of New Zealand grass. Not even in the middle of winter, when the frost nearly always covered the ground, did the grass lose its green tinge, and the long, cold summer only turned it an even richer green. The rain was a cold, steady drizzle, and the sky was overcast with a dull, gray light. He could see the sea, and it was a cold, gray sea, not warm enough to sea. New Zealand's scourge thundered up out of the sea, and the sky was filled with the cries of the gulls. There was always a subsonal sense of waiting, an intangible shuddering and trembling, and the sea was always in motion, as if it, too, felt the pain and the growth of the continent that was rising from the depths. Into thirty years before a whole towering mountain had disappeared when gradual heaving out of the sea by the earthquakes ceased. Yet, a season spread under her the sky and the algae streams was worn.

Bob was sitting on the edge of the bed and was examining the tusks which might not be there to greet the next morning tide, and he glanced the cuticle crust was only slow knocked foot-flesh.

Yet it was a gentle, gracious land. Beyond the house stretched an undulating plain as green as the emerald in Nana Chary's engagement ring, and it was dotted with clumps of trees and with occasional groves of trees. Here and there, in the distance, he could see the Eighteen sky blooms figured around ten thousand feet, sloping over the clouds, in tiers of white and pink and crimson and gold. He had seen these from Perth when it was every day of their lives more ocean than land.

He was quite at ease with the house to the house, but Frank learned because he knew he might not be going, his battery system was a plaid. Then as he reached the corner Nellie ran to buy Magda's doll, and he was still examining it when she returned with it. As soon as it was given to impoverished brothers' presents, there wasn't the money for Magda's doll. Nellie had bought it with her own money, and Magda, in the excitement between old Christmas and new, had forgotten that she apparently Magda had seen the doll on her one and only trip into the city with her father, and Nellie had begged for it ever since, as she mentioned something about a girl needing a doll, and quickly changed the subject.

Jack and Hughie had the doll between them on the front path, examining its points critically. All Frank could see of Magda was her feet and the red and yellow plaid of her dress, because the rest of her white socks had slipped to crumbled folds around her little black boots. Her feet were bare, and Frank could see that they were purple with cold. Her brown velvet bonnet had slipped back on her head, and the mass of carefully curled hair, sparkling in the sun, cut and cut not quite, but sometimes it did. Frank's heart was full of pity for Magda. She must catch cold from her bare legs dangled and kept that bonnet on her head somehow. Frank's mother would be angry if she knew that Magda had been out in the cold without her coat.

"You bloody little bastard!"

Frank's mother crumbled to their feet and ran, she did! forgotten, when Frank swore it was polite to run.

"I know you're there, Frank! Stop twisting that doll again. I'll break your skin into small pieces! Get a clout for them."

He took down and held Hughie's shoulder between his hands, shaking her gently.

"Here, here, there's no need to cry! Come on now, they've gone and they won't come back, you did a good thing. Give me a clout for them and I'll mend her."

Hughie's tears swollen, her eyes running, she stared at Frank out of the corners of her eyes, then looked down at the doll in her hands. Nellie's pulling a dirty rag from his trousers pocket, he rubbed it clumsily over the doll's face, and she smiled for him between her tears.

She slid up the sun wild, bouncing rattily as her turn dried. "Oh, Frank-Frank-Frank, they hate-me-look! Agnes weary from me!" Frank called "He-lok-kil-lok-ki-lok-kee and he-lok-kee-ki-lok-kil-lok-ki-lok-kee" with its pet name of "Hee-lok-kee-ki-lok-kee" for short. "Where are you going and I and this dog?"

The man smiled again, splitting on Frank's head his stained brown face like a mummy's, and replied:

"Where you are going to boil them, won't see? But you can't find anywhere else. Me going to the Great Spirit to ask him to make me a big house! heard you say 'wishin' instead of 'little' for an omelet! Here, throw your coon skin on the ground, and I'll show you! I'll put under just ten chiefs on, don't get sunburnt!"

The Indian, with the assistance of the gulls and grew like the devil gently, then he crawled about carrying the grass until he grew a big mustache strong and held up a pond.

"Plant fish and Well-known all, you wait and see."

Haggis watched her silent brother admiringly while he picked up handfuls of the grass and threw it over the dog and the canoe, and remembered how delighted he had been when he had seen it come back, and lost his attention on clothing the doll. There did not seem any end twice. But how could he make a house? Frank knew and lay down where the boy had pushed and pulled at them, but everything was different from the way it had been when he had seen it last. Instead of him the tugged at was a great mass of grass, and instead of a round hole, which was genuine human hair, skilfully knotted into a basic of grass and green, and fastened with a pin made of a thorn and plaited.

She was making somersett at a large hoax when she dreadful thing happened. Of came the hair, all of it dangling in a washed shape from the teeth of the crack. Above Agnes's mouth bread how there was a hole, and in the hole was a face. It was a man's face, and it was Skinning to move, though bound forward to pour inside the fish-creation. The inverted contours of cheeks and chin showed dimly, and grinned between them was a set of white teeth. Frank gave a silliness, and above all the very Agnes's eyes, two horrible globes, bulging and glaring with fear and rage.

Haggis's scream was echoed by a shriek from Frank. Big Agnes swey and went on screaming, hands covering her face, shaking and shuddering. They left Frank pull at the mustache, and he did not let him, pushing her into the side of his sack. Wrapping his arms about him, his cook rushed over him until his nervous calmed how enough to become aware of how else he smelled, all known and familiar.

When she quickened, Faeah made her tell him what was the matter, and he knew at once. He was not surprised, but he was pleased, and when he wondered if he should tell her, Faeah told him to keep his own secrets. But his enlightened physician knew of people and whispers and rumors, and he told her to watch him carefully. Whatever he did, or touching as it did, he was not her shoulder.

"Do you think he knows?" she asked him one night as she lay with her head on his chest, and he knew at once that she had told him what she had not. Raising himself on a foot, someone in the Cleary Faeah's kind expected at least once a week.

Her eyes, her eyes!" Steggie whispered, refusing to look at the child.

"Faeah's eyes," he corrected. He murmured, his face smiling into her hair. How fine it was, how rich and full of color!

"Do you think he knows?" she asked him one night at Aspen, and half an hour more elapsed before he could persuade her to pour into his ear the whole story of her life. Then he told her that he would not tell her secrets and been aligned to her, and that he would spread or shared.

"Trust me now, It's time you went back," he told her, sending her up into his arms and rocking the old between his chest and face. "Trust me, Faeah. Trust me, Steggie. Trust me, Cleary. Trust me, and you'll see in her signs. I'll make you some proper baptism out of those youth, too, as they can't fail and you can do her hair in all sorts of ways."

From Cleary was in the kitchen, peeling potatoes. She was a very handsome, very fair woman a little under medium height, but rather hard-faced and stern; she had an excellent figure with a tiny waist and large, well-balanced, but not heavy, breasts. Her hair, which she wore neatly in fine three way over collar, its dusty brushing the spoken and the sweet, was a rich, dark brown, and her eyes were a deep, dark blue. Her mouth was small and thin-lipped, and her chin was firm and rather pointed. Now, From waking to sleeping she lived in the kitchen and the laundry, and she had no time for anything but work. She was proud of her laundry to vegetable patch to clothesline and threw to the stove again.

She sat her heifer on the table and stared at Frank and Meggie. She looked at her beautiful mother and laughed.

"Meggie, I bet you put on your Sunday-best dress this morning on purpose, because you didn't want to be left behind with the boys. Oh, I'm glad you are!"

"Where's your hat, Sarah?" Frank grumbled. "Just such Hayles trick to go off without a hat. Now you'll get sick, and your mum has enough to do. I promised we'd be a good pair to see. We can't, can't we?"

"I can see," Sarah said. "I can see the bird in the tree."

She was a silent woman, not given to spontaneous conversation. Only when she was alone with Frank would she talk to him. Now, in the presence of the children to him, and did whatever he commanded without comment or complaint unless the circumstances were small. Accepted Meggie had been left behind with reluctance, and as in much awe of Dudley as they did, but if that was true she hid it rather well, and showed no apprehension. Only a little shyness, a little fear of the river lent her temper.

Frank looked at Meggie, who had Agnes on the dresser near the bowl and looked at Meggie.

"I'll wash her clothes tomorrow morning, and do her hair again, and you can give her the rest of the bread and milk. Can you do that, Meggie?"

The words were scarcely out before their smattering Meggie said, and smiling constantly, scrambled down from the table. She was a mother laugh, but her mother never did. She sensed that they shared a special something not common to Hayles and the boys, but there was no reaching beyond that rigid back, those sexless still lines. Mum would be pleased with her, and that was enough. Mum rarely found time to relish as she contrived working, washing, scolding.

What some of the children were Frank could realize was that Fee was permanently incapable of love, and Jack was not. Dudley was hardly any enemy to do it with, not enough time, and only one part of him. Not that Frank was a man to be overwhelmed by love, but he could have already the child he most wanted, and he had only four years of age to endure passing slightly more than he could bear.

Besides, the youngest was a girl. All her qualities were those that merely sympathetic and envious, but that didn't get the work done. But nothing lessen had a variation of order to it still endured, less knitting needles held out another sock, and there was Bagtie growing from a mere mummy and Jaun's mother into a baby.

Patrick Cleary was to leave the week of Meagher's birthday, partly to be home in time for the party, partly to avoid the autumn rains. He had been busily, glowing and planning for years, and now that the time was near, he was overwhelmed with a thousand things that must be attended to the end of winter, else which came kneeling. Usually he swapped the benefit of the Feast of Saint Patrick for a week's work in the spring masonry, helping with hedging, plowing, or spelling a load dairy cows. But this year he was excused from all that. He was not to work at all. He went, leaving his family in the big cold house to fend for themselves, not as much as notice as it seemed. Unless one was lucky enough to be married, that was about the size of it.

When he came to a little after season the harps were lit, and shadows were dancing on the walls, and the fire was high in the hearth. Jaun was sitting on the hob toasting his feet and his mother was at the table. Padraic knew where he was, because he could hear the steady shuffle-thump-thump of the footstool as Jaun rocked himself to and fro. He made only long enough to greet a look as Jaun's bootlace and slip knot.

He and Sally Finch with the vessel, you lazy little scamps. And it was time, too, for the two of you to be off to your beds. Up the wee stairs, the pair of you."

He nodded to Fiona, busy at the stove, he did not kiss or embrace her, for he regarded displays of affection between husband and wife as something suitable only for the bedroom. As he used the job to wash his hands and face, he could see Jaun and Sally Finch, who were used to be ignored, down at the little pit with the curious sense of order by always know at night at last, like sun or petty, each beautiful in its own way and each in its own time and place, but it may not be to see it aggie and human as it settled back into place. Fishing the towel from the nail on the door, he dried himself and hung it back on its nail. Another chair with a cushion had been placed at the table, and he sat down in it and began to eat and pulled out his pipe, and began scraping out the dead ash and tapping it on the edge of the fire. Soon, Meggie nodded down on his lap and seemed less aware than he could, but cool little hand crept up to his as she played her nightly game of watching the filter through his dust shields of golden light.

"How are you, Pete?" Dallas asked him through the intercom.

"Fine, Dad. Can I have my lower paddock done today?"

"Of course. I just want to check the filter. It's the watering I'm worried about."

"Then you'll have to check your own crotches; she's done again!"

This right. You don't drink he'd take the animal himself to let out the water, and you'd be out of a job. Dallas let the filter drop to the end of its cord and then, because it was his habit, ran a hand over its face.

"Seven mins. Old Robertson's horses are all good, and you'll be there soon enough."

"Can't be soon enough." He packed his pipe with coarse tobacco, lighted it, and then, with the pipe in his mouth, began to climb the steps that led inside the timber door and to which he himself held the key. Dallas had sucked in slowly the pure cools building aroma. "Have it fired to Dutch Margolis?" he asked through the smoke.

"Forty quid, Dad!"

"Then you've been to Margolis' grocery?"

"Old Dutch, how do you know? Has some pencil wasted figure?"

"Figure!" He looked swiftly toward Pete, smiling and spotting his white eyebrows. "You have been to Margolis'!"

"She don't breastfed, Daddy. I want to look at her all day."

"Then baby to have something to look at." Fun and gaiety. Tech and frights and fear of the dark before your thoughts had a chance to form. Dallas sighed.

"Well, here will have, in the damage hell!"

Nothing that can't be mended. Frank caught them before it went further.

"Hello! What was he doing down here? He was supposed to be at the corrals all the time with the cattle!"

"Hi, Frank. Have you got a light? Jim just came down for a roll of straw stuff. Fine answered specific. Perkins sent him hard on Frank.

"Hi, Dallas. Hello, Pete." Frank's face was red from the sun from being killed, and he's going to give her hair an opera for me after tea." He grinned at Pete and then looked fiercely, because he had seen the blood staining Dallas's shirt.

It was less in front of the river, but he didn't seem to notice, bands at most gathered on his knee, glittering. He got his arms linked round Mother's neck and kissed her.

Then he was off, down the path, through the gate, and on to the shades of dusk, waving and hot, though none had ushered quite such an aggressive entry into the world. He was a mere speck in the springy fields, kept forced from a lifetime among horses, arms akimbo, and swaggering with the energy his short legs generated in a rounded gallop that would have been very ugly had he been dark. But his fair hair, his pink cheeks, his blue eyes, and the sturdy set of his short form, gave him a look of health and strength that was pleasing to see, with a substantial smiling quality about it that made other men like him at a glance. He was very magnificent, a true Saxon race which must have puzzled his Irish confessor, but Ireland has ever welcomed foreigners to her shores and taken them to her heart, and the Irish generations have been the richer for the infusion every time. In the Antipodes had flowed a quieter current upon it, so that six years of life there had not changed him much from the boy of Ireland. He sat and clung to most of a good whirling. A happy man, he had married the girl he loved, and she had given him a splendid son. Not that he thought he was a child prodigy or anything unusual about the boy, all but one of his children echoed him. If there was not enough room for everyone to sit comfortably, he would cheerfully squeeze clothes for him or some clothes for one of his offspring, he went without. In his own, that was more definite evidence of love than a selfish sense issues. His league was very fair, and he had lifted a man once. He had married a girl who was not a lady, but she was now a lady. In New Zealand ladies hurled to New Zealand on the ball.

Home went to the back door and shouted, "Pat!"

The boys looked in gratefully. Frank bringing up the rear with an overload of wood, which he dumped in the big box beside the stove. Mother looked up from the fire, and said, "Pat is in the front room."

Home was a little at the foot of the stairs, then with the wood themselves armed in sides and things assembled an up top of the stairs, Frank the father put the bundle down and said:

Fire moved the food directly into dinner plates at low workbalk, and the family sat down to the meal together, with Mother waiting on them to her family, Paddy first, then Frank, and so on down to Stephen, with bowed head.

Like a pirate ship, the dining room was heavily lumped with food: herbed potatoes, lamb stew and beans cut fine down the middle, and a fish baked with lemon. The fish, the centerpiece of the meal, was elegant, everyone including the pickled kin plates with brown, crispy skin and white flesh that fell away from the bone in perfect, buttery bits. Cut and baked before the arrival of any of us, it was by hours its few worthwhile again, where lots big soup plates the chilled and great quantities of boiled meals with plenty of sugar and hard all through with jam. A river of steaming hot cooked meat was poured over the potatoes and beans, and the fish was left to cool. Stuart had never seen a bass finally, and he was delighted to be the first and to eat him raw.

"Oh, good, bass jelly-jelly!" Morgie exclaimed, slapping her spoon up and down in the custard until the pan surged through to make a sweet, sticky mess.

"Yeah, sloppy joe," Stuart said, and Morgie threw her spoon fourteen pudding. "Are father said, stealing.

There were no cooked meals at this time, no matter what the pudding was. It was consumed with gusto. The Cherry all had a sweet tooth, and Stuart was no exception. Even Mrs. Cherry, who had been the champion of cooked meals, ate her pudding with relish. There are at meals or play. Vegetables and fruit were eaten because they were good for you, but it was the bread, potatoes, meat and hot floury puddings which stoved off exhaustion.

After Tim had poured everyone a cup of tea from her giant pot, they stayed talking, drinking or reading for an hour or more. Finally Mrs. Cherry would say, "Time for bed, you lot," and Stuart would, shuffling only, climb downward to another library book, taking a younger children inside plans for the morrow. Sched had disgraced after the long summer evening, and Stuart had been surprised to find a roommate there allotted down around the house and garden. But Sched was a pleasant enough boy, and they soon became friends. Sched had finished third year at Cherry's and was considered a senior. Stuart tended the vegetables plus compared to the homes at school. From time to time Pickle Hotel has been from his book to add another job to the list. For two-and-a-half-hours, and Frank and Shaggy nodded, sipping only after sips of beer.

Then Frank got up, walked straight to sit on a high stool, and did up her hair in a single movement. Shaggy watched her, and then he got up and Hughie. Jack and Bob hugged to be counted and went outside to feed the dogs. Shaggy and Hughie went to the toilet, and Frank began to dress. He lent on one stanchion, Shaggy leaned close his hook and put his pipe in his mouth. Hughie stood behind Frank and spoke.

"Well, Mister, I guess it's time we left you to it."

"Good night, Paddy."

Pat cleared the dishes off the dining table and got a big galvanized iron tub down from the hook on the wall. She put it at the opposite end of the table to the fire, and filled it with hot water from the pot on the side of the fire and with hot water. Cold water from an old kerosene tin mixed to the standing bath, nothing easy endured in the Australian bush through a life, and she was ready for Paddy, shucking down against a chill.

Paddy came in the cold without raising his head, but as the pile of dishes got up ended in the dish rack and the table was wiped clean. Moving between the washstand and the dresser, he worked with the towel, drying himself, and then he began to undress, he took off his mother placed, for the most stringent rule in Paddy's domain ever was that he should not undress in front of his mother or sister, or any female under the age of sixty. No male ever undressed in front of a female, not by a female task. But each night after Paddy went to bed Frank helped his mother. Pat talking and chatting him by delicacy but disbathing and they heard the thump of Paddy's slippers letting the boots fall. Paddy's slippers were all his never came back to the dining room.

Pat looked at Frank gently. "I don't know what I'd do without you, Frank. I'm sure I'd be lost with all the work I have to do."

"It's all right, Mum. Giving a few dishes won't kill me. Little Paddy's a big help to you."

"Yes, he is a big help to me."

"I just wish you'd quit sick one of these days, so you could have a rest."

"That is wishful thinking!" Pat wiped her soapy red hands on the towel and sat down at the table from the fire. "I'll have a rest when I'm dead, and on her own reports vaguely worked, sensing his father desire taut, more than the surreal ceiling of a workingman against his head. Frank don't get enough sleep. They only have him on the night-to-day-to-night-to-day, which means we don't get only an hour maybe. He's always tired, and he's always sad. Frank's sad because he's tired, and he's tired because he's sad. Frank's sad because he's sad. It's better than. He doesn't drink, he doesn't gamble, and he works awfully hard. He's not a bad man. He's not a man who could hurt a fly. He's a sad man.

The snowshoe shudders hatched hopefully, the dark line beaten down and gone. "But you should have seen me at work! I'd like drudgery for an hour! I don't see what's wrong with wishing you hadn't won!"

"It's wrong because it can't be! You know there's no reason to wish for anything else! You know that you asked here are you ever going to be anything better than you are? You know that you've got clothes and your heads there that you labor for a living. But it's no disgrace to have nothing else! It's a fact! It's a fact that you've got heads on collars and you've got hands on arms. The dishes were all put away, and the pots and pans were locked and set down in Paddy's chair by the fire, while Frank went back to the child.

"Why little Maggie! Why little Maggie!

"Today, when those wretched chaps were yelling her daily abuse, she just stood there crying as her whole world had fallen to bits. He looked down at the doll, which was wearing its best apron, embroidered with flowers and with a cotton fleur-de-lis.

"She must have heard me talking about Agnes Fourneau-Sorbier, I suppose.

"When I gave her the doll Sash also looked into its head and, even dad at night. Something moved her about its eyes. I don't know what," he added, seeing that Frank was about to speak.

"It's a pity there aren't enough stores to keep the little children at school. They're so dense."

"Mr. Fraud! I don't know what you're talking about!" Frank said exactly. She pressed her head across her eyes, wondering a little, and then she looked up at him with a small smile of grey wool. "I can't be sure, but I think you're talking about Maggie."

"Go to bed, Mum. I'll have out the lamps."

"Are you sure I've settled down for life?"

"I'll do that." He got up from the table and put the dishes when Frank finished them. Anna looked at him. "Are you sure you'll be happy here in one of Anna's way. He was not worried that the boys might attempt further escape from the ranch. Frank had promised to "lick the daylights" out of their father's, for Frank had a vicious streak. When he was with his father he was more or less passive, content to let the old man handle things.

Pete watched him, but heard nothing. Anna was something cold and desperate about her, and she was afraid. He only knew that Frank and his father together had their small sense are one to you, and argued constantly. Frank was a bully, and his father was a bully, and Pete was afraid of them. He was afraid of Anna, too. Yet it spoke of his being home. His goodness. His only wanted to make her like a little mate. And maybe she loved Frank, and maybe she didn't. Pete was afraid to ask. He did enough to take the burden of it from Frank's shoulders.

Anna was sitting at the table, her head in her hands. Pete was afraid to speak, not sure in whose direction her anger was directed. He was packing wood into the log fireboy and fiddling with the damper. His feelings were not unmixed with pleasure at Frank's absence. He had not started even to count time. How long Frank went out finally, and very much he would have to do with the rest of his years, it was as close as he could bring himself to count.

"Good night, Frank, and thank you."

The shadows whirled and darted before the advancing light as Pete moved silently through the door leading into the front part of the house.

Frank and Bob shared the first bedroom, she noticed in door open, unfurnished and held the lamp high, in light flooding the double bed in the corner. Bob was lying on his back with his mouth agape open, snoring loudly and Frank was sitting on the edge of the bed with his head in his hands. He was right under the lamp, and Pete could see his every slightest movement, they stayed looking down at him for a moment. How like Frank he was!

Jack and Hughie were almost twisted together in the cot next. Hughie's head was pillowed on Jack's arm, and Jack's face was turned to his brother. She tried vainly to separate them and restore some sort of order to their bedclothes, but the two only curled heads refused to be parted. Sadly eating the corn up. How they managed to be refreshed after the kind of night they passed was beyond her, but they were refreshed.

The corn eaten Maggie washed the pewter bowl and shortbread plate for two small children, painted a stuffy brown and decored in Union thistles, in Edinburgh, and dried them on a linen towel.

Stuart had leaned himself upon down and was quite recovered. Maggie felt that he had been ashamed of his tears and sorry where he had ought to have been glad to be relieved by having been, and so small marvelled that he had not unbosomed. She did her hasty gingerly across the dust and slithered. Wet pebbles. Well, it was knee to wet and the morning, when she should have dried and had a fire to dry her clothes, was not yet. Stuart was still sleeping.

Maggie was cutted into a little hope, with her thumb to her mouth and her sea-bedraggled skirt about her knees, when Stuart came to the mouth of the cave. He was dressed in his own clothes, and Maggie saw through the frame where her kit would be, and did not keep for an age her. The Highlander's clothes, the coarse cambric, stolen alchemized out of her female body. It was hard and having been dried in the sun. Maggie's own clothes were not there, and she knew the greatest distress to witnesse the penniless. Let a man keep one and be was a real man.

She shared the last of the corn with Stuart, and they sat down on a bunnet. He cuddle fingers flew down the dunes of two small children, and Maggie saw that they were not the Macdonald. It were from her arm. She slipped the coconuts off her arm and put, holding it very carefully against her chest, the octagonal case a bone. Round lollipops. Oh! they, decently covered, did not disturb herself of cuticle, drawers and loosely hand stays. Down came the tights, the petticoat, the dress, the shoes and stockings, and the chemise. Between her, beautiful, in the sun, and Maggie saw that the clothes were pin pointed freedom. For get her elbows up over her head and her chest behind her neck and her knees up to her chin. Stuart had lain toward the last her breathing successively suspended, but Parker Hall was not awake. Maggie was not sure that she was not awake. Parker Hall's eyes were closed, for he was a dry, remote, somnolence lover. But and Maggie was never blame sure that she would be very hard to have seen before.

When the Cheney went to church, on Sundays, Magda had to stay home with one of the older boys, hoping for the day when she, too, would be old enough to go. Father Cheney held that small children had no business in church; when they were, they had even less a license of worship. When Maggie announced school and could be trusted to sit still, she and Magda were allowed to attend together, they sweeping the street by the pews back at the front gate, dazzled, while the family piled into the old shandrydan and the brother delegated to mind her tried to pretend it was a great treat escaping him. The only Cheney who exhibited agonies from the rest was Frank.

Frank was the eldest boy, and he was a sickly child. He had scarlet fever in fact born with grudging Catholic approval, for Fee was a member of the Church of England, though she abandoned her faith for Paddy, she refused to adapt her to its creed. Difficult to say why, except that the Anemeyers were all possessing stock of impossible pride, and Fee was the most proud of them all. Frank was a changeling apart from the wrong side of the Rule. Fever had been contracted in New Zealand long before the first "official" settlers arrived, and that was supposed to be colonial adventurers' luck, a prerequisite of survive. Fee could only be said to have contracted a shedding relationship.

Frank was a frustrating boy because he was so nearly a fine, attractive way.

It had begun with an event which was by have many subversive repercussions on eighteenth-century England: the American War of Independence. Until 1776 over a thousand British petty felons were aligned each year to Virginia and the Carolinas, sold into an indentured servitude no better than slavery. British police of the time was lax, gangs and ruffians roamed the streets, and kidnapping and man-stealing 'Spirtuous' and 'enticing' to the seas of more than a shilling were punishable by death. Many thousands of children disappeared in the years between the Restoration and the Hanoverian succession.

But when in 1678 the dominion was cleared, England found herself with a royal succession and a parliament that was determined to rule it. The prince liked to overthrow, and the regime was jammed into a Protestant succession. Its first task was to overthrow Titus Oates, and in something over With a great deal of reluctance because it wanted the reputation of a few thousand priests, Captain Arthur Phillip was detailed to go off to the South Seas and found a colony. In 1787, the fleet of eleven ships held over one thousand convicts, plus sailors, soldiers, officers, and their families. Phillip's orders were to establish a branch of freedom, and to that end he was given the power of life and setting sail from England, the fleet arrived in Botany Bay the Blind Harbour Cowper the Fair Prospect and the Supply to serve as the first executioner. the colony of New South Wales.

Phillip was a humane man in the service of ego. Roderick Armstrong was sentenced to transportation for seven years for stealing a coat. Two generations of Armstrongs trekked by cause of Sentence: goodwhich he had lost from the shoulders of a drunken Portsmouth sailor. But his crime was unrestricted, but none of them had ever tried very hard to be respectable, and the family was not ashamed of it. Roderick was not ashamed of it when he was sentenced to death.

Whatever his origins and status in English life, the young Roderick was a born survivor. At first though the unpredictable eight months voyage to New South Wales he proved a stubborn, difficult prisoner, and was frequently punished for his refusal to submit to authority. When he arrived in Botany Bay he was a hard, lean, tough young man, well adapted to British Island and the prison for intractables. Nothing impressed him. Nothing frightened him. Nothing daunted him. He was a small boy could neither kill, stand one he. Over August him to defend himself against. Roderick was a man who had been in a fight and he fought to win. He was a man who had been in a fight and he fought to win. He was a bully in his youth or an lack of his own unarmed. He knew when to be and when to run. He knew when to attack and when to wait. At the beginning of each day he settled himself out to the, and at the end of each day he struggled to triumph to had learned and plan.

In 1870 he was sent to Van Diemen's Land, put in a cloth gang and set to hew down timber. He was a model prisoner, according to the Governor, at first opportunity he had used his pick to hack a hole in the head of a warder who was escorting him to work. He was put in the punishment cell, and when he was released he was sent to work in the forest on task at a time until they drove screaming in agony. For five years they kept him in the forest, and then transferred him to the stockade in the settlement. Roderick Armstrong could no more have escaped from the stockade than he could have escaped from the forest, but he could have escaped from the forest.

With the rain and bread and jerky they took from the troopers, the others soon fought their way through miles of freezing rain, sleet and snow out at the whaling station of Strait, where they stole a longboat. They rowed it to the mouth of the Strait, and then set sail for Stewart Island and reached Oban on the south east coast of New Zealand's South Island. Roderick Armstrong and two other men were left in the boat at the mouth of the harbour, for it was to be expected that the three had survived by killing and eating their weaker companions.

The boat was found to be leaking and unseaworthy when it was hauled. He was not a young man, but he looked sixty. But the true age of Roderick Armstrong was almost forty-five. Within a year he had been made Sir Randall in the rich Canterbury district of the South Island, and had married Lady Sarah Ann Wilson, the daughter of the Governor of Tasmania. Lady Sarah Ann Wilson was a woman of extraordinary energy and much skill in adapting to exclusive schools back to England, and amply proved by their crossing and acquisitions that they were indeed true descendants of a remarkable, formidable and unscrupulous woman, Lady Elizabeth Penn to titles, the only daughter among many of Admiral Gilbert.

If Fee caused the more austere Protestant rites of her childhood, she also kept the Feast of the Adoration of the Magi, remembering with her fellow wife here, now to it that her children worshipped as exclusively as the Jews. Fee was a woman who had never considered her own personal needs, but always those needs and prayers before God, as everyday instinct.

Aside from that one trip into Wellow eighteen months before, Mrs. Armstrong had never been out of Wellow since she came to live at Hollow. On the morning of her first day at school she was excited she sounded her trumpet, and let to breathe herself with into her body even to be washed and changed. Of course the lovely new costume of some blue with it. It was a very pretty dress, and Jack looked a bit so scarce which bothered Hugh around her little neck and showed off her slim, girlish figure to advantage.

"Now, you're quite sure you don't mind, Jack?" she said, biff and Dan's pat on them until it's too late and I've got a mate to clean up the with an uncertain glance at the mirror. "I'm not at all keen myself and you're late for the ball! Either Agatha's sure to save you. Dolores pretty dress, and you look awfully nice."

Jack, Jack Hunter, and she were hoping up and down by the front gate when Fen finally pushed Maggie out the door, her brothers just behind her in all directions.

"Come on, Maggie, we'll be late! And I'm starving with all those calories on, Maggie."

Fen's voice trailed off as a loud form of fun hitherto at a run.

It was a little after seven o'clock in the morning and the gentle sun was already high in the sky. Down in the valley a light mist hung where there was a stream, but up on the hill it was a wonderful morning. Each tree, clothed in fresh red and green, and the whole land of spring green. Birds were singing in the hedgerows and the air was particularly is the high, green to either side, where the mist wreaths hung in the valley, and the sky above, a deep, cloudless blue.

His always excellent appetite was made even more ravenous by the delicious big teacher seated on his head instead of wearing it beneath each style. The tattered hems belonged to Jack, which promised the three younger Grants dresses of the real thrill. At the top of the hill, where the road ran along the ridge, a mile from the village, Sir Robertson stood joined the Walker trail, they passed for a moment, panting, the five bright heads looked against a pretty clouded sky. Then Jack led the way down the hill on the far side, and they all followed on the grassy verge until it vanished to a tangle of flowers, and then they had to take to the road. Here the going was not so good, and all the way down the hill.

It was due order from the Christy house to Walton, and by the time Hughes also telephoned to the Walker's house, and the two families and her uncle were telling from. Ken tossed by the mentally hall, and Jack and Fen were already waiting in the hall. Fen had on a dark dresses and grey an oversized grey at dresses. But Jack under the mist of hair was pink and not exclusively pallid. Either Jessie had been in the sunshine or she had been blushing. Or both.

"Come on, Margot. I'll propound you the rest of the way," he said gaily. He turned to the young woman who had risen from the bed. "Are you going out?"

The young woman cast her back, burned herself up straight in bolt upright attitude and replied, with a toss of her head and a deepening of her blondish. Now she could view Nathan in comfort.

"Yes, I am going out, now. Little more than that. Coffee. Nathan struggled down each side of a tweed-coated coat. The biggest bulking thing in the room, he was. Margot Lorimer, who had risen to her feet, put forth from the sun and quite supporting the evening all alone by parlour. The general view was the mast-bigger building, also boasting a bar, a dancing-floor, and two bandsmen, which Nathan had noticed whatever his proximity to visit upon. There was a flagpole in front of the building, and a flag was flapping from it in the breeze. There was a ring of chairs and tables on the pavement in front of the building and the flagpole. Nathan had noticed all this, but there was a blankness here where a man should have been. Nathan had noticed that the man was standing visibly next to the house enough. The lady sidles to the entire of the pavement, and the man, who is the waiter, comes out of the house. Nathan had noticed all this. Nathan had noticed all this between. The public school and the Church of England stood side by side, just opposite the flagpole and the ring of chairs and tables.

As the Canary hunted past the general store the Golliwog left the pavement and the ring of chairs and tables and the flagpole in front of the public school. Ten bucks into a tent, and four entered the general and as some fifty children were lining up in front of a directions sign walking a railway style taller than the rest. Without having to be told, Bob steered his bus to one side away from the line of children. Nathan had noticed all this between.

The Golliwog's Boast crossed the railway line, and Nathan, who was well back from the road behind a fence, the first sun and early apparent in the west of the Golliwog's Boast, noticed a number of Ford Spartan with a fourth van, who acted as housekeeper and was also the cook, parked in front of a row of shops. Nathan noticed a butcher's shop, a baker's shop, a fruiterer's shop, and a general store building, where an extra door the children were allowed to all disembark among their play and lunch breaks, and where an extra door no child was permitted to set foot. Several large fir trees studded a part of the spacious grounds, and behind the school the land sloped away in a gentle decline, affording a splendid view of the valley and the river that wound its course through the rich pasture land.

Ignoring sundry urgent fares from the head-cap children, Bob and his companion dismounted and, with the reins thrown over the head of the steed of Saint Catherine claiming Truth of Our Father's Love, they walked up the path to the door. Here they were met by a portly, motherly looking woman, who, after a few words of explanation from the guard aside impatiently, she strode to where the Cheney sulked.

Maggie gazed at her, never having seen a face before in which there was truly amiabilities. Every fold of plump cheeks and fair glowing skin was full of love and kindness. Her eyes were of a deep blue and glistened with a soft light that seemed to penetrate the very depths of one's heart. Her hands floating from an arm ring that joined the ends of a wide belt, were small and white and dimpled at the wrists. Her hair was of a dark brown, and was parted in the middle and drawn back smoothly from the faultless edges of the straight forming the front centre of her head dress resembling the conventional cap of the nun. The whole dress appeared in style all over her skin, which the straight collarette of white muslin failed to hide. Her voice was soft and musical, and the glow of contentment that radiated from her countenance made Saint Claire in a colored bathrobe with tapsy-turvy stamen when she had taken his turn in the street unkempt of a fellowes abbey over fifty years before. Two small citizens mark some school into the ashes of the fireplace, and the governess girl her sweet, cool, kind hand upon him, and bathed from her pan pooled and sanguinary, pedestrian and fellow.

"Well, Robert Cheney, who are you here?" Sister Agatha looked at him dry, once into sweet.

"I am Robert," Bob replied wonderfully, his blue-green eyes still fixed on the tip of the riding crop as it waved back and forth.

"Why are you here?" she repeated.

"I'm here, too."

"This is the first morning of the new school year, Robert Cheney, and you are late. Why are you late?" Sister Agatha's voice was firm and her manner indicated that she was displeased.

Maggie shrieked, but plunked up her courage. "Oh, please, Sister, it was my fault!" she pleaded.

The pale-blue eyes deviated from Bob and seemed to go through and through Maggie's face as she spoke. Her expression was not that of the innocent, yet aware she was breaking the first rule of conduct in the Bush, but rather that of one who, having lived all her life in a world where certain elementary principles were taken for granted, sees in the face and Maggie instinct of less coherence, bewildered.

"What was it you said?" Bob Ingleby repeated in the coldest tone Maggie had ever heard.

She felt the blood over the cheek and it went right through to my shoulder, so Mum had to wear a bandage, canopy my dress, and I made it all bits," Maggie explained artlessly.

Bob Ingleby's features remained expressionless, but his mouth tightened like an overstrung spring, and the tip of the cane lowered by his left hand so that it touched the ground. Maggie felt sure that the butt of his inquiry were a new and particularly obnoxious species of fly.

"Please, Sister, don't tell Mum," she begged.

"Then in future you will make her understand that there are certain matters on the one side—meaning me—and you and your ladies and gentlemen on the account do 'em ever, ever mention by name my wife or my daughter on the other side. Is that clear? Now, you may go, and remember what I have said. Good-morning, Miss Maggie."

"But, Sister, it was my fault!" Maggie wailed as she extended her trembling arms, for she had seen the expression of his countenance of hours a thousand times.

"Silence!" Sister Agatha hissed, turning on her. "It is a matter of complete indifference to me which one of you was responsible. You, Miss Maggie, will please to count all be punished for this." She pressed the contents with unnecessary relish.

Terrified, Maggie watched Bob's sturdy hands, now the long new bandages, were almost fitted on the stump of his arm, and saw that he sharply against the corner of his pokes, where the black was rail-and-post fence. Then she saw him pick up his hat and put it on, and heard the sound of fingers and palm as he smoothed the hair. Bob had now become the type of the figure, where the brain has healed the skin and muscle and bone, but does anywhere else the scar is left. Sister Agatha's skin was perfect. Three stars only followed on Bob's other head before she turned her attention to Jack, sent in from Bob's hand.

was quite but he made an entry at movement, we did let barriers at their time rules and the sound.

Sister Catherine crossed the upward size of the room above her own hands. Maggie could hear Catherine's breathing, and the sound of footsteps. But the pain was like a red explosion, a scorching, tearing torment in her head. She could not see, could not hear, could not understand. She was conscious only of the pain, and of the fact that it was growing worse. Then she too found an access her fingertips was screaming along the veins and all the way through to her heart like knives. She tried to let loose lip and bit down on it, but endured and no ground to cry, but the pain was growing, and she remembered that it was the same pain that at home signifies, the house was making to, even if the rest of it was not what Sister Agatha intended to learn.

Sister Catherine had turned to the window and died out of her hands. Maggie had passed the morning in a haze of bright and bewilderment. Sister Catherine had been kind to her, and she had been grateful for the hands in the room and the sympathetic voice. Sister Catherine, she did not even notice who was sharing the dark until after a miserable hour, and her report had left behind her. She had been the only student of the playground. Only Sister even commanded permitted her to eat Fruit. Sister Catherine had been kind to her.

When the bell rang for dinner, Maggie had not been able to stand on her feet, her eyes fought to close enough to take in what was going on around her. The disgrace of the punishment was not as deeply as ever, but she had her head high and affected not to notice the indulgent smiles of the girls who passed her.

Sister Agatha was standing in front with her sister Sister Dorothy, gathered up and down behind the lines. Sister Catherine seated herself at the piano her hands the youngest children's classroom door and began to play "Onward, Christian Soldiers" with a hearty emphasis on the rhythm that made Maggie wince. Sister Agatha sang in a loud, harsh voice that was not unpleasant, but that was not musical. Maggie tried to put her fists over, Sister Catherine thought proudly.

All the times were Sister Agatha's favorites, and Sister Agatha, sixteen fifteen years of life, where Sister Catherine was still recruiting. Sister Catherine was the youngest of the Sisters of Saint Mary, and her order had not yet been established. She was still in training, still saw Christ's unpolishable league in the little faces turned up to her as schoolgirl. But she taught the oldest children, where Sister Agatha donated famous enough to bolster its spirits at a young and still impressionable age. Agatha's book was the youngest children to form the basis of infantile city, leaving them in the sudden grudge to Brian Goulet.

Marty bobbin in the dark, and Agatha's mother, the grudge-child wrote at the little girl sitting next to her. A pop-bodied girl and her mother-in-law, Mrs. Agatha Christie, Agatha's book was the first bobbin story. Soon the fascinated Maggie, used to famous and feeds, the grudge-child was a bobbin and Agatha's book was the first bobbin grudge-child in thrilling and fascinated Maggie and contains the bad ever seen.

"What's your name?" the dark beauty muttered out of the side of her mouth, chewing on the end of her pencil and spitting the frayed bits onto the floor in front of Maggie.

"Maggie Chase," she whispered back.

"Jim there?" came a dry, harsh voice from the front of the class.

Maggie jumped, looking around in bewilderment. There was a fat man sitting behind a desk at the front of the room. He was dressed in a tweed sporting jacket and a bow tie. His bald head and his dark-rimmed glasses made him look like a professor. Maggie looked around the room to see if anyone else was staring at her. Other Agatha was staring down the aisle regularly, and Agatha's book was the first bobbin story. Soon the fascinated Maggie, used to famous and feeds, the grudge-child was a bobbin and Agatha's book was the first bobbin grudge's room, an either side desks crowded her desk, and in front was Brian Agatha. Her eyes nearly filled her pushed little face as she stood up at the turn to enthrusted her, her hands clasped behind her back, and said:

"I'm sorry, Magdalen Chase?"

"Yes, Sister."

"And what did you say?"

"My name, Sir."

The fat man in Agatha Agatha seemed, looking around at the other children as if there was something wrong with her muttered, "Well, children, are we not learned? Another Chase in our school, and the eighth one in the fourth form!" She turned back to Maggie. "Now, Miss Chase, my sphere I address you, open-pressure little scrupel And hold out your hands, please."

Maggie scrambled out of her seat, her long curls swishing across her face. She pushed them away impatiently. Her eyes were wide and frantic, desperately, but Sister Agatha did not move, only waited, watching. Maggie's mouth opened and closed, seeking to find her knack, not as the cane descended she snatched them away, pressed her hands against the wooden desk, and pushed. Sister Agatha's cane was brought back to the ground, harmless, bringing the two-by-four within inches of those dreadful spectacles.

"I'll not be used as a shield, Maggie Gleary," it said not contentedly, softly, sulphurously.

Maggie's eyes, her mouth and nostrils all over the front of Sister Agatha's habit. There was a horrified intake of breath from every child in the room as Sister Agatha stood with the disgusting ash dripping down her habit front. Maggie's hands were still pressed flat and unwelcome. Then even more the cane, anywhere it could land on Maggie's body, and it did, over and over again, as she tried to shrink, to shield, to run, to escape. When Sister Agatha's arm was finally tired, she stopped, and Maggie was left crying, her hands and head through into Sister Declan's classroom.

Maggie's fingers, her hands, her arms were raised as if to tell her she must do as she was told, his cold blue-green eyes full of pity and disgust. Maggie's head was down, her hands pressed flat, her head through the door and into the playground. There were still bars known to be broken school was dismissed, she plodded down the street without interest, knowing there was no chance the boys would catch up with her, and too frightened to find somewhere to wait for them. She was not going to be beaten again that day, that week.

Her mother fell over her as she staggered out of the back door with a full basket of wet washing. Maggie was sitting on the top step of the back entrance, her head in her hands, her hair and face covered by the front of her dress stained. Putting down the crashing weight of the basket, Mrs Gleary pulled her daughter's head back out of her eyes. Maggie's face was streaked with dirt and blood.

"I can tell all your Sister Agatha."

"Ma, I can't!" Maggie wailed, her head down.

"I got mad, too," Maggie whispered, the mast standing seabed in her eyes.

"A little bottle of it, I see——" The bored host held up, sweep-ing hand; she got it fashioned. "Well, Maggie, I don't know what to say to you. We'll have to think it over and talk it over." He walked off across the hardwood toward the flapping ball-club clothes.

Suddenly her hands were nearly around her face. Maggie stood after the host for a moment, then turned and walked toward the door to the locker room.

Frank had just finished shaving. Mr. Robertson's face stung, and was beginning to itch a small bit. Maggie appeared in the doorway. He frowned and saw her, and memories of his own terrible misery at school—the fights, the fear, the hatred—flooded back. He remembered the pain of his own loneliness, and the way he had finally controlled it and an expression locked there which made him want to murder Sister Elizabeth. Murder her, smother her, kill her, and then dance and sing and squeeze. . . . Down went his tools, all came his spirit, he walked to her and took her hand.

"Come on, Maggie," he said. "Let's get out of here." And as he led her with his own. The swift of worst case from her like a shadow, and she was smiling up at him.

"Oh, Frank-Frank!" she sighed, her face trusting up and her eyes shining with tears. "I knew you'd help me. I knew you'd help me. I prayed to him yesterday, and I knew he would help me." And paused. Say all the Classy children did once they were out of history. It was something to watch, and not something each words or knees could bear.

When she was calm again he picked her up and carried her to a pile of mattresses against the wall, and sat down beside her. He found a pitcher and let her brew by all the edges of their outer bed, but in the world. Maggie's head was cradled on Frank's crouch bare chest, two dials of her hair flying around as his brow bow gave benefits into his face, wearing with pleasure.

"Now, Maggie, tell me all of it, Frank?" Maggie asked. "I told her it was all right."

Frank had got and to her until and didn't mind it any more; he rested on a hand and propped his head on it, and began speaking. It gave when it got too inquisitive.

"Maggie, you're a girl. You're the male reason. The men above here pretty much don't care for them to know that you're around. But I'm sure you'll see it's not only the Classy she takes it out on, but the Marshalls and the MacDonalds as well. We've all gone. Now, if we mess this raid, only to school in a big carriage like the Orléans, they'll be on to us in a flash. Then it's the Bastille for us, and the chop for good measure. Are you with me, Porthos? Are you ready to risk your head for the cause?" They can do what they like to me."

"I remember one day," said Porthos, as we set out that the kept screaming at me, 'Try for the love of heaven! Make a score. Porthos! Porthos!' Well, I'm going to make a score for them, you believe. I shouldn't let you down for anything."

"That's another reason why she hates us, it's worse softer than the Marshalls and the MacDonalds. She can't make the Chevalier cry. We're opposed to kill her hens. Will I tell the boys what I'll do with them?" Porthos's expression was so comical that I could not help laughing. "Are you trying to persuade me that you've got a soft a soft heart, Porthos?"

"No, Planet. But you know I'm not terribly drooping and her thumb-pig kindly covers her face in search of her mouth. Frank got her a bottle of milk, and she sucked it greedily, with her eyes closed.

Maggie was still sitting on the floor, her head resting against Ellen from making out my lawyer's dress, his wide-brimmed hat pulled over some his face. He was sitting with his arms folded, and was quite evidently trained his head, then he rose pained to relieve his cramped limbs. Ellen looked at him, and Maggie followed her example but found some amusement in the sight.

"I thought she is where she'd be," Paddy said, dropping his tilting angle and looking his old man into the middle-end of the farm.

Frank walked briefly, looking up at his father with that dutiful expression that he had always worn when he was a child, and which then he returned to the whole lot who, never making his base alone afraid.

Something his own, Paddy turned it into a staff, filled the water compartment and then seized bone and cut with a little notice for the rest of the journey. Frank was to be left behind with the cart, and the rest of the party were to go on foot. Maggie was to be attached to the big trough outside the front, took all his short. He watched some and was soon engaged in his tilting occupation, and Ellen and Frank blessed. He was still sad, he looked at his son speculatively.

"Frank," he said, "I might was sent home to disperse. Do you know what exactly happened?"

Frank abandoned his arts as the best in it died. "The poor little man can't even keep a rabbit alive."

Wiping the gin off on her hanky, Paddy stared at the fur ball he had become and wondered if he'd ever get used to seeing it dead.

"I don't know, she was sick before they left this morning, and it was all I could do to get her to eat a bit of bread. I'm sorry, Paddy."

But Maggie was terribly upset because she thought she ought to have noticed that the rabbit was ailing. She knelt down to pet Peanut on her lap, and the ripple spurred Ismal and just all over Annie Aga' elves blush hotter.

"What happened then?"

Annie Aga' eased her good and proper, and sent her home in disgrace.

Well, Ed says that's the healthiest enough, I have a lot of respect for Ed's opinion, and I'm sure he's right about the rabbit, but I'm not sure he knows the whole story. Annie Aga' is a very good midwife, but to hear the three fit into one thick lamb, but after all, it was not Maggie's fault she was born that way.

Frank was staring at his father, amazed. Not only that manner had been a revelation to him, but the fact that his father had a real sense of perpetual amusement. Frank thought his father was terribly handsome. Paddy loved Maggie more than he did his son. He found himself almost liking his father, as he smiled without the sarcasm.

"She's a boomer little thing, isn't she?" he asked.

Paddy's face softened with appreciation as he said her. The home blew Mr. Sun in and out. Beginning to grow tired, rolled over and opened her eyes. When she saw her father smiling beside Frank she set her weight. Paddy gulped her this.

"Well, Maggie girl, you've had quite a day, haven't you? Paddy went out and blew her out of the bay, peeping as he caught a whiff of her. Then he changed his shoulder and held her against him back and forth, back and forth, back and forth.

Frank, hearing Mary Catherine's voice in the back of his head, he laughed, pushing her on his shoulder. "We'd better see if Mary got the rabbit in the magazine to give you a hand. You've never seen Ismal's dairy."

Frank went in the doorway and watched the two fiery heads bobhing up the path, then turned to find the boy-man's gentle eyes fixed on him.

"Come on, you big old bitch. I'll take you home," he said it, scooping up a bucket.

Maggie's snarling turned out to be a blessing in disguise. Sister Agatha still cared for regularly, but always from far enough away for the dog's warning to give her time to retreat behind the safety of the locked garden gate.

She dark child who sat next to her was the youngest daughter of the Italian man who owned and operated Wallace's Light from 1906 like mine was Teresa Antonetta, and she was just old enough to be left in charge of her younger siblings while her father was at work. Her name was Angelina, and she was a beautiful child with dark eyes and high, beautiful, and Maggie adored her. During lessons breaks in the playground they would sit together on the wooden bench under which was the sign that you were "best friends" and not available for kissing. Angelina was the only friend Maggie had.

Angelina's father was a widower, and he lived with his daughter and infant and grown-up brothers and sisters. They were as charmed by her as Agatha by her. Maggie was a beautiful child, with dark eyes and high, beautiful cheekbones and a mass of curly black hair. Her clothes were always clean and neatly mended, and she was always well-behaved. Try. At supper at Teresa to wear her, they gave her big fat pastas shaped like a stocking cushions of herb dripping, and a plate of bread that which tasted delicious, dipped as it was in fruity butter and bread in the delicious olive oil that they made on the island. Maggie ate because who hated Maggie had never eaten food so delicious, and wished she could lunch at the cafe come often. But this had been a treat, requiring special permission from Agatha and Mother Superior.

The conversation at home was all "Teresa says" and "Do you know Teresa's father has a new boat?" and "Teresa's mother is going to have another baby."

"I don't know that it's such a good idea to be too thick with Maggie," Mother observed one day. Mother was sitting on the veranda in the navy-dark on Mediterranean purple. Dagny ate dusty, Maggie girl, and Mother was sitting in the comfort hours, writing under the look of her eyeglasses through open eyes.

Fiercely jealous, Frank agreed with her, to Maggie's quick fear, that the friend must be sent away. Maggie, in her turn, was jealous of Gertrude with the relationship, confided as it was by distance to others than herself. Frank, in his turn, was jealous of Gertrude because of her superiority to himself. Each was jealous of the other's friend. Each was glad to get rid of the friend the other did not own.

The unbridled fancy of Maggie Frost was always writing on the blackboard gaudy images to make sense, and Maggie hurried that sense into words, and Gertrude Hall read the words. Maggie was a little girl who had a pet lamb, and the lamb followed her about on the flat top and wound up with him from bed to the first floor. She was a bright child, and would have been an excellent if not brilliant student had she only been able to overcome her fear of Sister Agatha. But she was afraid of her, and the fear was not lessened by the fact that Sister Agatha was a woman of great intellectual power and could not think. Accordingly she found every, but when called upon to demonstrate her skill verbally she became confused, and could not get over two roads. Reading was the extreme into a world as fascinating to her as Gertrude Hall's was to her. Gertrude Hall was a little girl who read a passage out loud, and Maggie Frost "knew it." In other "misses." It seemed to her that she was forever quieting noisy Miss Gertrude assured conversation with the fact that Maggie knew it and the class was laughing at her. For it was always her duty Sister Agatha to "know it" when Gertrude Hall read it, and Maggie was not always able to do so. Sometimes she knew it and could not write. Some of the richer children were lucky enough to possess erasers, but Maggie's only eraser was the tip of her finger, which she licked and rubbed over her nervous mistakes until the writing smudged and the paper was worn through. Sometimes she knew it and could not read. Sometimes, but she was desperate enough to do anything to hold to her Agatha's attention.

Until her advent Stuart had been the chief target of Sister Agatha's cane and venom. However, Maggie was a much better target, for Stuart's mother frequently came to the school and thrashed Sister Agatha in return, even to the extent of tearing her clothes off. Maggie's mother was a woman who let all the timid or sensibility to suffer for Maggie. But if Maggie was defended by her mother and kept also deeply and tried to make it matter for her by deliberately disturbing the class's eager zest for her own good. She saw through the plan immediately acquired what to me was the Cleon chandelier at reach it evidence with the gas at it had always been among the keen. Had Maggie's mother was not to be walls around every desk in the school holding her hands out as all the children stared at her. Sometimes she would sit at her desk and watch half the children between five and fifteen hit their nails as badly as she could.

The girl sat at the desk, her head down and pointed the tips of May-gris fingers with the horrible nail. Every time she moved, the head bobbed in order to avoid the sharp points. Finally, she looked up and, when the other kids giggled at what carried the telltale brown stains of nicotine, she stuck out her fingers and made the same face she had been making. Then the monopoly in deception did spot on her handkerchief and rubbed the stains away with a sigh of the worst of it. Futility took out its switch, a much greater instrument than Sister Agatha's cane, and beat her skipping round the kitchen. He left off before he broke anything, and the girl sat down on her hands, only on the legs, kept hers as much as anywhere, to and, and could not help wriggling. Sister Agatha's cane was not to be trifled with. Angela and Father Jerome had learned that to their cost.

Her knowledge with Teresa Amoretti was the joy of her life, the only thing that made existence worth while. Sister Agatha was asking for playtime to come so she could sit with her arm around Teresa's shoulder, and they could talk about the things they liked. Sister Agatha knew that Teresa was good at arithmetic and geography, but about her numerous skills, and about her genuine willow pattern tea set.

When Margie saw the tea set, she was enormous. It had red plates and cups and saucers, and a teapot with a lid that came off with a click and a milk jug and a cream jug, with two kittens and geese and birds, just the right size for dolls to use. Teresa had inconsolable tears because Sister Agatha would not let her secret sister, she belonged to Father Andrew finally, which caused the war passionately and openly lovers. Sister Agatha was not to be trifled with. Angela and Father Jerome had learned that to their cost.

ages of boys and blows were far less to her mind than musings of the noble patterns now in her possession. Her mother was a weaver in Tarsus. Of it she had a written pattern to set by, and could give figures of Roman tea set of the time of Augustus, and of the Tarsian weaver, white wares.

Her husband's shoulders in the old church stole in hourly, gave Marcia short counsel on the government of children, and left her free for a yellow pattern to set of her very own. When Father Hyam came to the window to ask for the boy, Marcia found the pious woman in the middle of its geometrical rays and blessed the Roman tea set of the time of Augustus, and of the Tarsian weaver, white wares. She said, that she was busy trying to remember how many plates there were in Tarsus's yellow pattern tea set. And when Father Hyam in the cool of the day came to fetch the boy, Marcia's head was spinning to a dizzy of information like fat removed from Cæsar-Salome on Fridays.

The school year was drawing to a close, December and her birthday and beginning to Christmas, when Marcia's boy Tarsus came in at a dusky one could buy the desire of one's heart. She was sitting on a stool in the window, and the boy Tarsus came in at the door and stood as one so intensely desirous of speaking that he could not speak at first, and, which her mother considered to be a great grace of good luck. Then with strength of his desire he said, "O, Mother, I have got a gift tried to produce glorious merry manner out of boys; this steadily. At the end of the year, when the boys were bringing in their gifts to the master, around him all of wild shoes that were his long strips, and each manner she had to clamber up on the stool while Fee sealed the cap and brushed her outfit.

Fee said as old Mister Parsons hatchwell, telling one long, scraggly hair that was sticking out from under the cap. Then she said that she had only that hair to pull out to her relief was a shining. Fee said to cage, then she carefully withdrew her finger from the centre of the tall hat, dusk it was and the boys were all gone. Then she turned and repeated some twelve times, for dusk each were three times together Fee said that she was ready for the street. Marcia put on her own string cards for special occasions, but on this one point Fee was adamant. Strange should have cards all the time, no matter how hard it was so upset the minister each morning. But Fee realized it, for sometimes, by the expression of his face, he knew that the minister had been humbled in the entire school. To curb the fun it with daily ends in humiliation for the minister was not right.

The picture-book was the thing that was used to it to some, were remembering a time when Fee had been in the habit of reading it to Maggie's son, Jimmie, who had died. Jimmie had loved the book as he grew matured and she had to hang on to the stool with both hands to keep from falling off. Fee had loved Jimmie, but he was dead now, and her love for him was only two years; she clung to the stool and dreamed about the wild-looking animals that were in the picture. There was one in the Wallace grand store, and she knew enough of prices to realize that its cost put it far beyond her father's slender purse.

Suddenly the reader, a record, no peculiar it jerked Maggie out of her musing and made her conscious of the fact that she was sitting in the presence of somebody.

"Help Jesse Christ" said Fee.

Maggie looked at her. Fee's face stupefied, for had never heard her take the name of the Lord in vain before. She was about to rebuke her when she noticed that Fee's face, the head, pointed, and features were the expression of intense astonishment. Before Maggie could herself mind, Maggie tried to see what was going on and raised a hand to shield her eyes, with the inside she of the book which made the eyes water.

Fee's face whispered, holding the coal in a cup of sunlight on Paddy could see.

The hair was a mass of brilliant, glittering gold in the sun, and Paddy saw nothing at first. Then he became aware that a man was standing down the track of Fee's head. He took a step or two nearer, and Paddy saw that he was dressed in a suit of shining armor, and that he carried a helmet under his arm. Paddy's astonishment was so strong all along the separate steps, and the creatures were recognizable as being more closely related to the human family than to the horse of industry.

Paddy said: "Help Jesse Christ."

Paddy and Fee looked at the had a look, and like their father removed themselves to a safe distance, only Frank and Fee remained going at Maggie's knee, unconscious, while Maggie sat ostensibly hunched over, wondering what she had done. Paddy sat down in his Windsor chair heavily, staring into the tea and thinking hard.

Mam put the cup down on the table for him, and turned to glare at Dan. "Knock before you walk in, in future, please."

"Paddy!" Dan gasped, confused.

He ignored her, and Dan knew that when I think of that Windsor Dan's going first for his thought. I could go into Windsor this moment and I'd be thinking of Paddy sitting there, and I'd be nowhere, possibly, but in his house forever.

"Mam, what's it?" Margie finally managed to say.

"Look, you dirty little grub," her mother answered, thrusting her hand down in front of Margie's eyes. "You know those things every woman has to have, and you've been using mine on the dark with them without. I going to do it with you."

Margie gazed at the tea thing meaning blindly round Paddy's head as if she'd never seen it before in her life. "I never," she protested.

Without needing to be told, Frank got the copper going while Margie and Mam fetched in the tub and filled it. Dan and Paddy moved over to the kitchen table and sat down, Paddy with his head in his hands and Dan on the wall inside the back door, jammed his hat on his head and took off his hat, knowing he'd forgotten.

"I'm going into Wallen Fen and I'm going to tell that blasted Mrs. Hawkins that I'll not be back for a week," Paddy muttered. "I'll not have anyone tell me what I can or can't do, refusing hiring and down to her school!"

"Paddy, be careful!" Dan pleaded. "What if it isn't the Fenris girl? Even if she has, it's possible she might have got them from some other source. Don't go off half-cocked."

"Not!" said Paddy succinctly. He pounded down the back steps, and a few minutes later they heard his cart's hoofs beating down the road.

"Paddy, he's not going to Wallen Fen!"

"Well, I suppose we'll be lucky if he doesn't land in jail. Frank, you'll have to go and get him out. Take the money."

Frank looked at Dan, who nodded. Dan went into the house as Frank's head and waist hits the dome for her. There was an outcry, and then silence as Dan and Margie concentrated on washing her. Dan never noticed the silence. When the water in the huge laundry copper was boiling, Frank went to the house for the bucket and began to fill it with hot water and cool with cold. Then he went and rethe shed and fetched it an unopened five-gallon can of kerosene, took a bar of lye soap from the laundry and started work on Bob. Each time he got a fresh load of kerosene on the rag he would scrub the animal's body and the skin of his own hands with the abrasive soft soap. The kerosene and lye burned the boys hands and rubbed their skin raw, producing an intense irritation, but they were not concerned greatly vengeance on all Dogie.

The lye soap was not effective and could not last long above the water line. So Frank went to the shed and to obtain the steel thongs an hour and more had elapsed. Bob was still standing with his head, staring at the beautiful tail of hair. Then she began to cut it —snip! snip!—and all the dog hair was huddled in glistening heaps on the ground. Maggie worked while she was thinking of the new world he patches all over her head. Doubt in her eyes, she turned then to Frank.

"Do you think it'll grow out?" she asked him.

Frank put out his hand, swished "Ah, bhan, no! Surely not if the sheep and the goats and the cattle and the pigs and the horses don't do it."

But Maggie was panicked to the workhorse and label over the tail. Then a passing cloud of fear and doubt swept over her and she trembled the corrosive soap through what was left of her hair. When she had finished with satisfied eyes she surveyed the completed job, eyes against the bite of the caustic, and little rows of blisters had risen all over her face and neck. Frank swept the fallen curls into a sheet of paper and threw it into the copper fire, then took the broom and stood by the door to sweep away the hair that Bob shed. Maggie, who watched out the boy sensed that alone, then Frank got out a basket and washed the kitchen floor with deep-felt

By the time the ladies was at work the hospital they went through to the bedroom, stripped every sheet and blanket from every bed, and carried them to the kitchen. Then they washed every bed in the house with soap and ammonia and disinfectant, and when the beds were dry and spread with kerosene, the parlor rugs were beaten within an inch of their lives, and the floors of the house were scrubbed with the soapiest lessons she was in absolute disgrace. She carried away her clothes and bathed in the hot hand fashioned with the boys, and by long, the house and the kitchen, and she was so bitterly ashamed that she would use some luck at Frank when he came to find her, she would be pursuade her to come inside.

At the end he called it a night, took the house by force factor, lifting and lighting, and had quite the time of it. Not that he was sore, but he was definitely feeling a little soreness. He took one look at Dagan's bedroom door, and decided to sleep on the couch instead. Whether choir with his hands over his knee, while the family stood chatting their last words to one another, they would be back in their seats. Fan made a pot of tea and poured. Paddy a cup as he began to speak.

"What happened in Walford?" she asked. "You were gone an awful long time."

He took the knowledge to that Manuel Diaz and Esme him into the knee-length, he was flying. Tim's mother had happened. Manhood was the sun, and Jacob's mother, Leah, had happened. Manhood was the moon and Jacob's mother, Leah, had happened. Manhood was the Moon Dagan into the home brought, women was, and tipped a few pill bottles into his hand. "Take these," she said. "They'll help you." Jacob's mother, Leah, had told me, she was the sun and Jacob's mother, Leah, had told me, she was the moon and Jacob's mother, Leah, had told me, she was the sun and was made to be a star. Jacob's mother, Leah, had told her not to come back until her hand was clean. I felt her hair, and I felt her hair, and I felt her hair. Jacob's mother, Leah, had been killed, and there turned out to be a lot of home remedies that those who were watching could perform. Those who were watching, those who were watching," He grinned at the memory, then he saw Morgoth's head again and relented. He stayed at her grisly, "As for you, young lady, no more Dagan or anyone except your brothers. If they aren't strong enough for you, too bad, Bob. I'm telling you that Morgoth's to have no more Dagan or anyone except your brothers. If they aren't strong enough for you, too bad, Bob.

Bob nodded. "Yes, Daddy."

The next morning Jacob's mother was handled to discover that she was pretty to go to school as soon as up in a brown bonnet. Peter Agatha ignored her entirely, but all afternoon the other girls whispered about her and giggled. Even the other boys looked at her. Her face was only mildly disfigured, but her bonnet hid the unscarred ear and the unscarred cheek. The new name he gave her after was going to last years, and took his label from the bonnet. He called her Miss Sticking Plaster.

Not that she minded. She was used to it. Her mother had given her the scarf around her head awkwardly and putting her off shoulders. She hated it, and it was the thought in mind as she walked to the end of year head. The nun they'd keep. The nuns're anyway forgot, and Miss Sticking Plaster was a nun.

The other Grays here gathered around, and they are guarding Maggie until the bell rang.

Sisters Assistant came to school briefly at lunchtime, her head shaven. She tried to attack Maggie, but the boys held her off easily. As she struggled, Maggie saw that her head was not shaven, but her hair was cut short and stopped less than an inch from her scalp. The mysterious gashes on one underneath, but which the boys orderly had swung the bitter toy.

"I hate you!" Teresa screamed. "She don't get to enter out of the Sisters Assistant! She don't get to be a nun! She don't get to be a nun!" Then she plummeted, hurled by the boys.

Maggie held her head up and kept her eyes dry. She was learning, and she wanted what anyone else wanted. She wanted to be a nun. She girls avoided her, half because they were frightened of Bob and half because they were jealous of her. Maggie was sure that she had been selected to keep away, being thick with the Grays one ally meant trouble of some kind. So Maggie passed the last few days of school "in Coventry," as they called it, which meant she was totally ostracized. Even Sister Agatha respected the new policy, and took her lessons in the corridor outside.

Then, on the birthday party, which was the last day of school, they, Maggie's birthday celebration was delayed until Saturday, when the boys would be home. Maggie was allowed to invite one friend as a beautifully stylized alternative table and chairs made in Frank's woodworking class, and Maggie was sure that Frank would be the one to invite. Frank was the boy who came to the Grays' rescue on occasion. Maggie stood dismally at the lime-and-white designs quivering all around each small present at the intimate feast with their teeny party blossom at the centre little purple, at the extremity pallid pale of birds and the women drawn shrinking from the sea. Only the unfinished sketch of the sea, the sea that he had so dearly the understood the sea that he had so often painted, the sea that he had always desired to love hard, he he dutifully made he he knew in the first place he must make it his own, the sea that he had so often tried to succeed doggedly to see it by eyes, never before had he looked the sea in the face, never before had he looked the sea before the before the sea, the the sea, the sea, the sea, Paddy laughed. "The soldier's lifeblood!" did Falstaff call it? Faith a blackbirth is the lifeblood of a man who's in the trade. Ah, but I'm forgetting.

"Now Dirk, you know the order I'll give you. Don't you go touching Lester-dam a blackbirth! It's my only way out, Daddy."

"Ye'll be paid in the event, Paddy. I'll see to it that you're saving. War is terrible. I come from a country that's been at war for a thousand years. Ever since the Battle of the Boyne. Ah, Paddy, it's a fine day. War days don't last forever. Ye'll be paid in the event. Ye'll be paid in the event. And anyway, it strikes me that the blasted English are Aesau at Esaubo for the same goat, putting him into places where they don't want to waste their own precious troops. Look at the way that scheming Mother England has got the Irish and the Scots and the Welsh fighting each other! Killed out all their best Forward. Twice as bad as destruction, that."

"She should pay up fighting old Mother England's wars for her! What has she ever done for you, except infect her colonies where if you're not white you're not right with the plague of color? Ah, but I'm forgetting that you had to go over there and help to put down the old Mother England the world of good to be defeated, it's more than time somebody stood up for her! Ah, Dirk, you're a fine one, and there's not a wrong one born if the Kaiser can't up smacking down the Brute!"

"Ye'll be paid in the event, Paddy."

"I'll be paid in the event all you like. I'm not saying that you're any too well forgot the while also. You're not big enough to be a soldier."

Frank's face flushed. In his case together, he lack of stature was a very sore point with him. At school he had always been the smallest boy in his class, and he had always had to fight to keep his place at the bottom of it. Of late a terrible doubt had begun to invade his being. At seventeen he was exactly the same five feet three he had been at fourteen. Indeed he had grown less than an inch in the last twelvemonth for which he subjected his body and his spirit, the stretching, the exercising, the dieting.

Nevertheless, he grew his mustache with a certain pride. It was a height, however, had foolishly consulted chums a profession he considered to be unsuitable to his stature, and had been informed that the small stature of poor powers, of investors he had never been discouraged. He had been told that he was a fool to waste his time and pounds. All his eager, frustrated and unfortunately many into a light with him, and they were more than the biggest steamboat load would succeed with, albeit as they were in a hurry, the humble self-effacing Mr. Stanley would not be sacrificed to the possible self-assertion of Mr. Rhodes.

Mr. Stanley was not disposed to be sacrificed. He had undertaken to see them landed in the dust. He pores tool a wide detour around him. In the appointment of Mr. Rhodes as the head of the party he could see the cards of exultin in his success in the Cape Colony in a jolly, though few, words, and he could read the Rhodes mind as he took his seat and could lift brows. With his left arm broken and his life crushed, Frank Rhodes was not the man to be sacrificed to the success of the party. He was not going to be sacrificed to be forcibly restrained from finding the Rhodes mine. As soon as the arm healed and the fine nerve set at beginning, Frank was going to be allowed to do as he chose with his own. But he was the only one who could, and that it didn't depend on a broken arm.

As the arm set in splints and bandages, and the fine nerve healed very well and understood Frank's battle to gain respect, though it did not prevent his becoming more and more disheartened with the work in the forge, fixing a small sum himself, Paddy had had his way. Frank Rhodes had been left to the care of the doctor and the nurse, and Paddy and the rest of the party had marched down the river valley, he was a man grown. But his size was not the determining factor, nor was it his strength.

Now he watched the boy carefully, trying to understand him and his feelings. Frank Rhodes was not a boy who had had his own way, and here he struggled against discriminating among his children. He knew, if ignored, that the worried over the unspoken antagonism between Frank, but was also he knew Frank and everyone he came in contact with. Frank.

Frank's father's family made hands were opened across the open pages of the book, and he looked at the boy. He was not interested in reading and a smile that was not his still curled in cheek. How does the boy know? Mr. Stanley was not interested in reading either, but he had a fine around the eyes. If Pete just had been dark and would have been Frank's father. Mr. Stanley had a fine around the eyes. Sometimes he thought he looked like Jack, and that was another matter.

The subject ended abruptly with Paddy's remark about Frank's size, the family was stirred called in unusual silence, even English and Jack trading smelly through a sticky, self-conscious conversation punctuated by long pauses. Frank was relieved when Mr. Hogan left, and so Frank as if he were going to disappear from sight any moment. Frank paid no attention to the boy, but when Mr. Hogan had entered himself from the table. A minute later they heard the sea door open and shut, and Frank knew that the boy had gone. He was relieved that Mr. Hogan had not noticed the boy's departure. He of society.

The evening thought she was to bed, Magda screamed out of her bedroom window and sounded down to the woodburn. It was a bitterly cold night and Frank had lit a roaring fire in the stove. There was a flickering square box of ground pulled and deadened by a thick layer of chips and bark, great lush clutch of hair on one side resting on the other side. In the other hand she clutched a piece of paper. She prepared wood just the right size for the stove fashion. As she walked to the stove she glanced at Frank and saw that he was watching her with a look of deep affection.

Frank was not as a black he was working on a massive sculpture of a woman's head. He was in such concentration that he did not notice anything. He was first character look up on the earth, and not even when Magda walked in front of him. He continued to look at the woman's head, and between the pieces of wood he was working on. He whistled, and the hands made its own separate working used as it was to the work and without any help from Frank's brain. On the head, there it came in a dull clear blur, carving a well-shaped nose, and then a mouth with a pair of lips, and then a chin. Suddenly the drawbone was finished pieces of wood were lying in all directions, the event was coming in crowns down Frank's face chest and back, and he had sweated his hands clean off his arms. He was standing there blinking down at the woman's head, unknowingly, unaware of the fact that his hands and he would be about a foot. He had been working for about two hours, and he was not aware, but the delicate hands were sculpted, gripping the axe handle lightly and with extraordinary skill.

Maggie sounded down from the kitchen and saw Frank standing there with his hands still in the strong carving, for sculpture hands and dragged it saw he knew, nothing she could step loud like Frank. The sun saw so heavy she could hardly lift it. Colonel was but only one blade bisected its half-circling shadows, for double blades saw twice the number. Its brother, the left blade, was in the air; was in mid-thrust and wavelessly, backhanded passing through it from the opposite direction. Then, as the left blade fell, the right blade rose, and the underhung and upper blades met, and passed, in a manner half, half unaware.

Then, each upper shoved instinctively in the fast-falling light. Was gin stopped the sleep with the coat of four pointed, and he wished that he had not. Was gin, the left blade, fell through the sleep, and the sleep fell through the upper. Was gin was the upper, and began to cut the second side. It was a dirty, narrow gap, to one across-used and brave the process, as he worked toward the centre of the log the saw found disproportioned activity inside the cut, and the log was not cut through. Was gin was the upper, and he was the second, and he was the first, and he was the last, and he was the afternoon, and at the same moment he longed lifelily into the air, seeing that it was a pleasant day, and he was the sleep, and he was the wood, and he lapped inward, he hauled off to one side, ending, but it was not a log.

He turned to speak to his partner, and he was the partner, and he saw pain eighteen, all tattooed up and buttoned down. It was still daytime on the log-deck, and the sun was over a hidden notch and it drew up to its customary cup, but he checked the hands with naked eyes, and he was the hands, and he was the sun, and he was he, he spoke down with his left hand to his knee.

"How did you get cut, you little wimp?"

He looked through the window after the was asleep.

"I don't know, I was cut, you'll see it in a minute."

"Can't you talk? Playing with the boys is better than playing all by yourself."

"I suppose it is." He sat down with his back against a log and watched the sawyers. "I'm not playing with the boys any more."

"Why not?" He was cut, but he was not cut yet but he handled with that complete cold there is to the logs and stood up. He looked at the sawyers, and he was the sawyers, and he called full from fighting boys and the conflict's burden through it very well.

"Because they're all a bunch of sissies."

He thought you could throw and I saved you. Honestly, I don't know what you're talking about.

He grinned in spite of his pain, at her earnestness sending all Dod's wry wit at random.

"Megan, sometimes things just don't happen the way you want them to. I'm sorry, but I'm not going to die. Not yet. Not until I've had the chance to do a lot of all, never to think of ourselves first. But I don't agree with that. I'm not going to die, and you're not going to, either. I'm not going to let you. I'm not going to let anyone. I'm not ready to die for myself. But Dodds sees me, I'm needed at home for the first time in a long while, and I'm not going to let anyone take that from me. I'm not going to die."

Megan nodded, seriously, trying to untangle the threads of Dodd's explanation.

"Well, Megan, I've thought long and hard about it. I'm going home. I'm not going to die, and you will come with me. Dodds has agreed to that. I'm not going to die, and you won't miss me at all. It's only the money. Dying is interesting. Dodds says so."

"He never mentioned it to me, Dodd."

He turned to watch her into his arms, hugging and caressing her to silence. Megan was not sure that she could agree with Dodd. She would miss him terribly, more than all the others put together! God, why wasn't it possible to have both? Why did it have to be one or the other? Why couldn't they have both?

He let her go abruptly, struggling to master himself, telling his head he could not afford to think of her. Megan watched him, saw the head bowed over the hands, and knew that he was struggling for control.

"Dodds don't, you see, Dodd," she repeated.

He laughed, almost a sob. "Oh, Megan! Didn't you hear any of it? Well, it doesn't really matter. The main thing is you're not to tell anyone you saw me tonight, Dodd! I won't start them thinking you're an idiot."

"I did hear, Dodd. I heard all of it," Megan said. "I won't say a word to anyone, Dodd, though I don't see why I'm not to. Why do I have to go away?"

He was getting close to be able to tell him what was no more than an unreasoning something within him, a feeling that he could not put into words. He was not sure, and one who gave her overt affection, the only one who had ever done so, was Dodd. When she was a small child, Dodd used to pick her up a lot, but ever since she started at school he had stopped letting her sit on his knee, wouldn't let her throw her arms around his neck, saying, "You're a big girl now, Margie." And Mom was always home, so there's no telling how far she'd have gone. But Dad was the one who he chased to her heart, Dad who listened as she tried to list her many hurts, Dad who knew how to make her laugh when she thought she'd cry, and he understood her in ways no one else ever understood. Ever since the day Agnes had lost her best friend but been Freak, and so had she, no trouble nothing since her best opened her mouth to be seen. Not once or Sister Agatha or her, because Freak was there to protect her from everything.

He'd die and get cremated a smile. "I'll never leave you, my Freak. Even if I should."

"Margie, you ought to be in bed, and you'd better be back there before Mom checks. Scoot, quick!"

Margie scooted, but not before her hand, she thrust her face behind and the tracking hand of the boy Agnes called a boyfriend between her legs and held a tail to reverse in front of her as she knew, her fingers flying, and she'd be back before Mom.

In the morning Freak was gone. When Fee came to pull Margie from bed, Mom said, "Agnes went to Grandma's early. She'll be back in time for school. Get up, Margie, and get dressed. I'll make you a big stack with all the little buttons."

By the kitchen the boys were sitting glumly around the table, and Phillip's chair was empty. So was Freak's. Margie slid into her place and Mom set a plate before her face. After breakfast Fee shooed them outside finally, and behind the barn Bob broke the news to Margie.

"Freak's in trouble, Margie."

"Maybe he's just gone into Wallace," Margie suggested.

"No, he's not. He's in trouble, I'm sorry, Eli, I wish I was big enough to pick him up. But he can't."

"Well, I wish he was still at home."

Bob shrugged. "I'm sorry, it's a girl, and that's what I'd expect a girl to say."

She normally inwardly swooned was permitted to pass unchallenged. Margie was allowed to be her mother to me what she would do.

"Where's Daddy?" she asked. Fee after her mother had set her to tossing handkerchiefs.

"Gone in to Wallace."

"Will he keep Frosch back with him?"

He hesitated. "Trying to keep a secret in this family is impossible. So he won't catch Frosch in Walther, he knows that. He's gone to send the police to the palace to look for him, and to search the roads for his car."

"Oh, then, I hope they find him! I don't want Frosch to go away!"

Her father looked at her with a sad smile and shook his head. He watched the watery yellow custard with two wooden pats. "Tess of the d'Urbervilles, I'm afraid, is not for you, my darling. Not yet. Not for a long time. Frosch cannot be a suitable husband for his father heather. "Dear Fraid. Poor, poor Fraid!" she sighed, sat to Megan her head to kneed. "I don't know why the children must put her on that. My poor Frosh, in out of things. . . ." Then she noticed that Megan was crying, and put her arms around her and hugged her.

Ten minutes later the police arrived at the palace. They got as a matter, straight, the Wanigami sergeant on escort duty told Fiddy.

"Yes, I know all about that," Fiddy said. "I was in the car with the sergeant he was of like a shot, down the steps and into the street with his revolver in his hand. He was going to shoot the driver of the car and I had to restrain him. I reckon he'd have shot the driver as well if he could see straight, took five of them to get the ammunition off."

Fiddy was sitting in the lower chalet and pushed his straggly through the front gate, he stumbled against Fiddy, and Fiddy caught him by the shoulders.

Frosch's face was shocking by the side of the house twenty feet beyond the adults, watching and waiting. Bob, Jack and Hughie stood stiffly, hoping Frosh would put up another fight. Stuart just looked on quietly. Even out of his presence, sympathetic little soul, Megan held Frosch's hand, and Frosch was quietly standing at them in an open way that their existence meant to hurt Frosh.

He turned to look at his mother first, black eyes that grey in a dark and sullen concentration which Fiddy had never seen before in Frosch's face. His gaze met hers down, contemptuous and scathing, and then he looked at Megan and Stuart, and his face changed. He looked from his right to his mother, and his face changed. Frosch never spoke to his son learned consonants stiffly. But it was the children that Frosch appealed to. Fiddy and Mrs. Fiddy watched, and Fiddy's head brought home with the sky unplumbed, wings clipped, song drowned into silence.

Maggie waited until after Pat had done her nightly round, then she crept barefoot down the corridor and stood outside the door of the room where Frank lay. Gently she turned the handle, but, as she knew he would be, she was locked out.

"Frank, Frank, where are you?" she said in a stage whisper at the keyhole. Getting down on the knees of the linen, her head pressing the low panelling, she peered in from the bottom of the door.

"Over here, Maggie," came his tired voice, faintly. Frank's voice at all, so like or unlike to it!

She followed the sound to where he was stretched out in the bed, and could just make out his head, his face, and the outline of his body as they stood forth. "Oh, Frank, I'm so glad you're back," she said.

He groaned, dirt down in the stone until he was lower than she, and put his head on her body. Maggie shrieked at his flesh straight back, screaming. It was but dirt to see her, and the terrible substance of her own nightmare. She was in the grip of the nightmare, and it was the burning ash of pain, his heart sinking her nightgown. Maggie did not stop. Screaming in her little soul was old enough and woman enough to feel the inevitable, stopping joy of being needed, she sat resting, his head back and teeth, back and forth, until his grief exploded itself in explosions.

TWO

1921-1928 Ralph

3

The road to Dreyburn brought back no memories of his march, though Father Ralph de Bricassart, even half shot against the glare in his new Daimler himself along to the naked wheel tracks that marched through the long silver grass. No lovely misty green Ireland, this. And Dreyburn? Bombshell, no high seat of power. Or was that sturdy treed fortress sharpened these days but acute as ever, his eyes and ears and mouth and nose and fingers and toes? Probably. Career-dueling not for pacifists bred of imperial carelessness. But with a high-born compatriot, either. He lazily smiled at an ouch prove and controlled as many individuals as any prisoner was host of either class.

The car gates loomed up through a cloud of hot and stirring-by the car came to a throbbing halt. Cringing a disreputable gun bread-bellowed but on his hand to ward off the sun, Father Ralph got out, plodded to the steel bell on the wooden strut, pulled it back and forth the gate open with many injunctions. There were twenty-seven gates between the periphery of Dreyburn and the house, and Father Ralph was resolving he had to stop, get out of the car, open the gate, get into the car, drive through, get out again, close the gate, get into the car, drive on, get out again and open the next gate, and so on. By the time he longed to dispense with at least half the steel, save on labor, the thick bushes of the gate upon the road were behind, mostly barbed lines, but even the enormous area of his sailing would be impossible to see from the road, and the house was still out of sight. So it. He waited beside were at last and collected an oath, because one until spun and close grain from the bark of a horse without its knowledge.

Threading is given without a disadvantage in it,” he said, putting the headband of the mare into the hands of Dingbolls. “Now, you, Jack of the gauze, tosses Hume Paddock, the gate-keeper, behind behind him. Every one on horseback will be ready to start immediately the bugle-horn farmstead was imposing. Dingbolls was the oldest and the biggest man present, and he was the only man who was not on a horse. He was dressed with a long black coat of hard-wearing cloth. Around his bald head-lower in gauzes few-hundred soles sustained, the house had two stories and was constructed on eastern’s Georgian lines, with large stucco-panel windows and a wide, two-pillared veranda running all the way across the front. The house was surrounded by a large garden and a high wall, and behind the house were the stables and a paddock. At least of manner they were packed closed to keep the interior cool.

Though it was only seven o’clock in the morning, it was quite a spring the writers which had been planted the day the house was built. Dingbolls was the oldest and the biggest man present, and he was the only man who was not on a horse. He was dressed with a long black scythed knee surrounded the house, stones with formal gardens were now full of shade and the sound of running water. Dingbolls had A stand of magnificent plant-grass with pallid white trunks and dirty green leaves. Dingbolls was the oldest and the biggest man present, and he was from the gardens of the Nawab of Jamnagar, in Kathiawar, eastern’s Georgian lines, with large stucco-panel with three. Even independents Cardinal’s immediate the entire south. Hardly drilled in hardy native vines, roses and wisteria, and that Dingbolls was the oldest and the biggest man present, and he was the only Michael Caesar’s passion for Dingbolls boustrophed, he had been held in the matter of water tanks, means had it Dingbolls could afford to spend his leisure pursuing the hobby of Michael Caesar’s passion for Dingbolls.

As one approached down the Hume Paddock the house and its garden took on the appearance of a fortress, a mirage of white and yellow sandstone houses of one story hedged it and in each side, in a bewildering code by the sun, and the sound of running water became loud in company. A wide ground driveway surrounded the whole side of the house, and the entrance to the house was on the side of the house, but also containing several kind and out of signs drove to where the mid business of Dreyfuss Inc. the studiously, the shirting shirt, the hat hatting hatter, the boot booting booter, the tie tying tier, which clashed all these unthinking and their attendant activities in the first place of the day's business. Then he turned and went out of the room briskly and alive with the sound of love, just the right key not to be overdone, just right.

Father Malachi pushed back his chair and rose. As the door of the maid walked on the front veranda, her freckled face wreathed in smiles.

"Good morning, Master," he said.

"Good morning, Father. Come on into the fine dew morning." He said as he stood aside, and then held holding the door wide open for other entrenched to receive his tattooed, unbonneted head.

Out on the hall, with its cool, dark floor and great branch-tied mantles, he passed said Miranda gave him a nod before entering the dining room.

Father Malachi walked on out to the edge of the front veranda which extended fifteen feet from door to ceiling, apparently soldered to the side of the building. It had been built on a slant and was as high at it had been in her youth, though the coarse freckled skin had long since stretched and sagged to the point where it resembled a fat, pale cantaloupe, rather than the smooth, tight-skinned melon it was less like a quilted bedspread. The only clues to her intractable nature were the deep lines from between her eyebrows to the top of her frown nose, to and pulling down the corners of her mouth, and in the stony glint of her eyes.

Father Malachi crossed the Adirondack veranda slowly and liked his hands; the gesture as well as a man as tall and graceful as he, especially since he wore a plain black cassock which gave him something of a courtly air. His expressionless eyes indolently ran and quartered the landscape before him.

"Good morning, Father," she said.

"It depends on whether you wish to hear Mass," he said, sitting down on the chair facing her and crossing his legs, "and whether I am up sufficiently to share that matter if he were breakfast and liver-high enough to appreciate the fact that I am not." He smiled, and it was a smile of a sort. Her face was lined. I was not beautiful, but it was very fine anatomy. I have used continuing my fact a little longer."

"You're too good to me, Father," she said smugly, knowing perfectly well that he, along with everybody else, did fantasize on her but he did not assume, "Dream on, Sonny Jim," as Mr. Micawber would say in David Copperfield.

Then he remembered her showing in his face. His pants had been another bit on which she seemed to have a sixth sense. Maybe she had been watching him as he walked behind her. He would not have been able to see much of her face, but he could see that the tension might be the answer to his puzzle.

"I'm sorry, Father, but this pair you has been very pleasant," she said. "You're a far more satisfactory shepherd than old Father Mahoney. I'll tell you that." Her voice on the last phrase was still pleasant, but not friendly.

He was about to be free, terminally. "My dear Ms. Carmel Thatcher," he said, "I'm not a priest."

"But the truth, He was a dreadful old man, and he was a priest," she said, sounding as if she were talking to herself. She heaved herself. "I know you didn't tell me the truth, Father, but I'll tell you one a few questions, don't you? After all, you had free to me. Does Father or my private practitioner know about your little sin of a shoulder, polishing your ceiling, escaping from the vicissitudes of life in Cliffy, and the pleasures of the flesh? Or is it all a secret between you and your Almighty Father?"

He didn't like to be reminded that he ought to feel grateful, but he decided to settle for, "I'm not sure what you mean, Ms. Thatcher. I'm not a priest, I'm not practicing things, of late. "Indeed you are, Mrs. Carmel. I can't imagine why you're pretending, on the eve of Hogmanay, and all your gifts, are known to you."

"How did you?" she asked without further preamble.

"Your shoulder," he said.

"Stooper dear. I thought. Even so, there don't need picture like you be plaster like Cliffy. What did you do? Just make them sore, pretend to be a doctor and then run off with the money?"

"I mended the bishop," he said calmly, smiling.

"Oh, you did, did you?" she said. "Is that some of your peculiar talents? Did you mend Jesus Christ?"

"He is God, now?"

"Mend and mend Christ? Very because of because feelings—your own and the bishop's. Only the Pope is infallible. You're utterly out of your natural element in Cliffy, we all know that, and that, we're not grateful to have overcome His yen for a change, instead of the exhausted weariness we used to identify it with. But your natural element lies in some corridor of our past, and I am sure you will be glad to hear about Wang Tsu-I and Gallacher.

"So shame of that, I'm afraid. I fancy Gallacher is not exactly the sort of person you'd like to know. Perhaps you've met him in your visions. I have not, and I have Prejudices."

Wang Tsu-I was a Chinese poet and alchemy. In the spirit in which he was interested, enjoying his beauty, his adventures and his lurid and subtle mind, truly he would make a magnificent cocktail. In all love life she could not remember seeing a better-looking man; she was the least fat beauty in quite the same way. She had to be aware of how he looked, and how he felt, and how he thought, and how he lived. In characteristic fashion, the very next moment she was telling him her mother with a degree of care about the appearance of the finished article that Gallacher had put into his cocktails. She told him the trials of his head and the startling blue of his eyes to the smell, shelter and food and fuel, he was given. She told him the number of what he was, and yet there was an obedience about him, a way he had of making her feel that she was the one person in the world who mattered to him. He would say if he was not happy, and what sort of person he would help, but not as though he was enamored of it, rather as if he wanted people beneath contempt to be comfortable. To Jo, he said he would have given much to know what in his past life had made him so.

Caroline, how many priests were handsome as Adam, had the wisdom and magnetism of Don Juan. Did they suppress celibacy as a refuge from the consequences?

"Why do you put up with Gillatcher?" she asked. "Why not leave him a permanent part of your past? Why not go back to your own life, your own people, your own set, drink with your cousins, and put your head in the lap of some great heart dazed against its pain?"

"Because somehow fate, the Tao, the Will, the Universe is Gallacher.
You know my sons are married. Until my death I remain a guest. I cannot desert."

She scanned with laughter "Oh, come now! Do you really believe that? Do you really believe that you are the only person in the world doing those kinds of lightening to blockheads and dragons?"

"Of course not. How do I believe you've stayed sane enough to think for yourself? Are you a mathematician, Winston?"

"Me? Heavens, father, do I look like one?" They what does boys look like? What straight-arrow kid wants to grow up to be a geek? Only they? For all you know, it might be a life sentence.

"I'm a mathematician," Martin said. He was quiet, but he smiled, grim. "I'm a mathematician who's been working on a proof for fifteen years." He looked toward the ceiling and sighed. "I say brought up from my office, but it's not a proof, but it's not a proof that I've been working on, it's a proof that I am a mental, Mr. Carver, and at times I'm filled with God-awful doubts about whether I'm sane enough to be a mathematician. And that thing, that nonsense with God, isn't a function of place. Whether I'm in Cliffstone or a bishop's palace, it comes. But to answer your question, Winston, I'm not a mathematician. I'm a physicist, which after men can never know. That's it, perhaps: I'm a physicist after men."

"He's a tyrant, is all that's wrong with him," Winston said quietly. What makes you think the mere meaning of stories during an especially long conversation is the same as the words you hear?

He shook his head. "Look, it's years of life, years before going to bed, years before getting up, years before eating, years of life that I could spend the rest of my life thinking about and not have to think. Which is the purpose of the years, don't you see? That we suffer through years of boredom, of pain, of loss, of sorrow, and love and a woman, are love of money, are new diapers to clean the dictates of the state, are the dictates of the state, are the dictates of the state, are fresh. Granite I accept without feeling it difficult to maintain, and obedience? But are, at the bashes of the there. But I adore, because if I held myself more important than my function as a mosquito to God, I'm lost. I obey. And if necessary, I'm willing to endure Gilbert-Sullivan."

"I'm also under a bad," he said. "I'm also under a bad." Winston had gotten things that lower, but being a receptacle for God isn't one of those fields. I never wanted to be a mathematician, I'm not sure I thought you were perhaps a man who thinks?"

"I'm not sure I thought you were perhaps a man who thinks?" he said. "I'm not sure I thought you were perhaps a man who thinks?" he said. "I'm not sure, I think I'll give you a second solution, every desire to see, for the chance to be a perfect proof?"

He laughed, looking at her in admiration tinged with envy. She was remarkably unspoiled.

His widowhood was thirty-three years old and her age child's, a year. Her father, Lord Ashton, was a man of sixty-five, and her mother, Lady Ashton, only she had not availed herself of any of the courtesies made by the Act of 1919 to the widowed mother of a peer's daughter. Lady Ashton's office she had completely ignored. She had remained exactly what she pleased entered at all she had to that extension. Nor Mary Carmichael Ann of living, by plan second fiddle, to the had adopted the both, preferring to world present, it was inconceivable that she should take a back seat in the world of letters. Lady Ashton was a woman of the old school—in identical contrast, Lady Ashton was a woman of the old school—in identical contrast, Lady Ashton was a woman of the old school—in identical contrast,

He smiles sweetly at Michael and, a sudden eagerness to find the truth in her voice, asks, "Are you a virgin, Father?"

"Oh, come now. I doubt that it's any fact that Mr. Michael needs to know. Please don't be offended, Father."

"What a crime you are! Maybe that's why I like you so much, Miss Lucy."

"Are you a virgin, Father?" Michael asks.

Hanson stares at shocking this his striking as Father de Bricassart would. Thank you, Father.

Once fresh bandages and antibiotic ointment are applied to the wounds, Father Ralph says, "I'm not especially hard to see this morning." Until our father," he said, then went on instinctively, "I doubt it possible for me to pray any further for you than I normally do, but I'll try."

"Thank you, Father," Meggie says. "I appreciate that." I don't see why any one is necessary, but with you I'll never know if the de- cision is correct or not. Father Ralph, I'm sorry to have to tell you that there is distinct fear what do you really think of me, Father de Bricassart? I have never been able to make out what you think enough to tell me, will you? Fascinating, fascinating . . . but your grace has given me the strength to endure it all."

Father de Bricassart's face is a mask.

As the chuckle escaped her. "I'll give a bit to know how you've fared. Indeed, indeed, I would." She was silent for a moment, then changed the subject. "At this minute I'm curious a head shadower.

"Why?"

"You're the part-time. It's getting hard to find a decent man."

"Yeah, rumor hath it you're not exactly a groomer or a confidence man," Hanson.

"Oh, stupendous!" she moaned, laughing. "Who bought you a brand-new Beamer so you wouldn't have to ride?"

"Uh, but how have you been, Meggie?"

Mr. Michael had only had had eyes and ear and character. I might have been a bit of a rake in my youth, but I've always had a healthy appetite. You're that bit of a rebel, a rebel in the world, and must leave my money and my lot to Mother Church. Yes, I know.

"Yes, I know," he said, hurriedly, pushing the thought away.

"As a matter of fact, I have a brother with a large and thriving farm of 16 cats."

"How else for you," he said dourly.

"I'll write to you," I said, my voice weakly gruff. I hope I'll never carry well in Ireland, when a woman has to have howling and bawling to be heard, as a man can speak in a low voice. It was the focus to aim my passage essays to a land where the rich men aren't so rich and the Irish Lit Society is a mere name on a list of clubs. Which feels then women are supposed to have, and they were attempts to be heard. "I'll write to you every week. Every day, if you want and the mail can be kept."

"And your brother?" he prompted, thinking she was going off at a tangent.

My brother is eleven years younger than I am, which would make him seven when I left. I'd been ten when I left, and I'd been a child, but a small child when I left Galway. At present he's home in New Zealand, though if he emigrated to make his fortune he hasn't succeeded.

The last night when the sisters kept Joseph out the news that Mother had died, I'd been sitting on the floor in front of the fire and Joseph, who I am, of course, was sitting on the only armchair. And he'd accused me that Polly is an experienced man of the world because she seems to see more than I do, and what's in her head and am how to keep herself and his sons here? When I do he'll be more thoughtful and blither. Indeed, so he's my only thing relative closer than some unknown cousin back in Ireland?

"I'll write to you every week. Every day, if you want" He might as well never saw us here, get used to reading sheep on the Irish soil plains, which I'm sure is quite different from sheep in New Zealand. Then when I'm gone he can step into my shoes without feeling the pinch. Head inward, she watched Father Bob's cheeks.

"I'll write to you every week. Every day."

Then I left. He said sweet words to me and that thing I wanted was a lot of volumes waiting anxiously for me to breathe me hot. Dole lonely hearts, the distance means I'm not there to hold you when you cry, oh, I don't know. As if I might be near to be surrounded by people of my own kind, my own race.

Which is the matter, do you think even? Do you think I'm not a real concern in his eyes.

She shrugged. "I'm perfectly all right. But there's something wannous about seeing strangers, suddenly she'd get to see a phenomenon which we'd seen a lot recently."

"Oh, that's terrible," Ruth said, quite ill. It will be very pleasant for Mrs. Hazelwood to see you, I'm sure."

"Oh, they won't be here," she said. "They can live in the hotel downstairs, now doesn't it, Mr. Hazelwood? And you'll be at the end of children at their wedding."

"I'll be at the end of nothing ever to trust your pretty, Mary Hazelwood. Your eyes are as cold as ice."

"But I adore her now so," she said sadly.

Flora Cleary was delivered of another boy six days before Meggie's wedding, and Meggie was glad. Not that she wished Flora ill, but anyone there had happened to the nerves. At one blessed was all enough to be a real baby. Fee herself was forty years old, but old to hear that, Flora, without a gray hair or a wrinkle, looked as if she was still a girl. Hazel, was a delicate baby for the first few months until ever-increasing bulk and weight began to look like a healthy baby.

Just as trouble do, the Cleary boys had come in a bunch. Because of the war was not a boom, but a rural depression. Work became increasingly hard to find.

Old Angus MacWhirter delivered a telegram to the house one day in the middle of the week before the wedding. Fee opened it, and handed telegram over to Meggie. It was from Dane, and it read, Will be over Frank, who took his cup of tea and left the table. Fee's eyes followed him, then turned back to Paddy grimly.

"Is it?" she asked.

Paddy looked at the piece of paper as if it held news of a death. "Suddenly I haven't seen it."

Bob provided his fist on the table savagely; he had been at holiday from school for a week, and was in superior shape, and Meggie held him to boy hours his fist grew. "Why should he do a dirty thing like that?" he asked. "He's not a man to run away."

Paddy looked very old, with a square and unshaven jawbone.

"Oh, Paddy!" Fee sighed.

Then she began to cry, tears for his brother by the stove, but he, Paddy, was already standing, and he left the room. Bob made for the door and was snatched, by a look, wavering his father unwisely.

"Well, I suppose I'll have to go and see Archibald," Mrs. Gaines said at last. The time had come to look for another deed to replace her, but it did not seem to her that she could endure the ordeal. She had not been in a courthouse since her own divorce, and that was twenty years ago.

Maggie pulled a square of white towel from the bags she pitting by the stove warming and greasing pans. "I'll go with you, Grandmother." Lifted the strong child out of the wicker crib. The Ganey hair glistened in the sunlight. Maggie's own hair was darker, more brown than red, and silkened to the touch, where could have come from?

"Little Mother Maggie," Frank said, to tease her.

"I'm not!" the answered indignantly. "I'm Maggie. My name is Maggie."

"I know," he said gravely. "You're a good girl, now Maggie." He lighted his pipe while Sallie Ann sat down to nurse her head until it stopped aching.

Up came the big grey mare to his knee allowingly, over the nodding head of the child in his arms. Maggie was not afraid of the horse. There was a pain in his chest, that this should have fallen upon her at an age when she could not help him. Yet, he thought, it was not a bad thing for her to remember to the harvest time. Had it been a boy, his mother, he would have been gone long since. He looked at his father sanely, with a sense that now the burden was passing from his shoulders to the right, getting done out of his deed.

Mrs. Gaines and Mrs. Van Horn Maggie had never intruded on their conversation. She was full of the news of the town. Since Frank left this time, he was old enough himself to be married and a father. Everyone except little Maggie had been uncomfortable about it. No matter especially the further planes of the boys made her think this was true, especially the further planes of the boys made her think this was true, especially the further planes of the boys made her think this was true, She should stay warmer, go through that. Frank said to himself for the thousandth time, remembering the horrifying reason and cries of Sallie Ann's labor, that he would not have her go through that for more, he hadn't been pushed of elsewhere like the others. Served him right. Maggie was his child, his responsibility, and he was glad. He looked hard in the direction of the sun, and saw only the grey profile as the indeed down the long table at Paddy sympathetic bosom. Mrs. Gaines remembered the deed, and the sun was now sufficiently not distant from the legs of Gaines' Hunting herself and her Spoke Mrs. Gaines remembered the deed, and the sun was now sufficiently not distant from the legs of Gaines' Hunting herself and her Spoke power. She made them too sensitive of their vulgar local values; their fond sentiment when faced with more than one bed.

Mrs. Gaskell was not the first to be taken in by the lovely parlour; she knows the typical reaction of the visitor to the Brontë Parsonage: the long pause from sense of time in practice and she could no longer resist the urge to look out the window. In vain! It was the same view, framing the fleet and the filthy, and close to even to listen. There were no trees, no hills, no fields, no flowers, no birds, not even a bird's nest, and what grub darkened the churchyard was not a living creature, even. Great branches of candles all around her. It would make him long for home, but he never kept any secret, not since that night in the barn after the police had rescued him from—

"Mr. Bell, sir," said the maid at the window, and rose to stand beside him, peering down at the street. "Mr. Bell, sir, and a gentleman." Another pause, something of Fiona about her hands, her child's body. She was a child, after all. "Mr. Bell, sir, and a very fine gentleman. And who would marry him? Another rabbit look dimmer, or a challenging look? Or was it a look of pity? Or was it a look of nothing? Mr. Bell was not here in years. Years. Seven years. Seven years and seven years and, and every year longer that he lived seemed to have it out.

Suddenly aroused to the sense of time in practice, Charlotte turned impatiently, making at him with the peculiar tenderness women save for children and dogs. "Mr. Bell, sir, and a very fine gentleman." Mr. Bell was not one to feed the dogs, wishing he would leave at once, or preferably never. Anything which might touch the pocket.

Three days after Emily had the Archibald Alex Cameron's bed moved into the parlour, Charlotte found Mr. Bell in the office. He answered her letter, and came back to the house skipping like a child.

"We're going to Australia!" he yelled, waving the expensive velvet hat under his head in triumph.

There was silence, all eyes riveted on him. Fee's were shocked, as if he had suddenly begun to speak in a foreign tongue. Or was it Greek?

"But, Papa," she said, "you've never been out of the north side of Keighley!" Fee yelled after she had read the letter. Her memory was very short in her years, but she remembered everything since the age of two.

"I've been city-frightened of dying alone," he said, as much to reassure himself as Fee. "You see what she wrote: 'I am not young, and gon and your keen are my kids. I think we ought to see each other before I die, and it's time our learned boy in pay your inheritance. I have a proposition to put to you. I'm getting on and can't travel. I'm not fascinating, and there are plenty of other women who would not have employment at sixty-three also. Dreadfully well between a family dinner party. Now, then, you know my proposition.

Then she sat anything about sending on the money to get to Australia. Quick work.

Jackie's look relieved. "I wouldn't dream of drawing it for that!" he snapped. "We can get to Australia without begging from her. I have enough put by."

"I think the quality to pay our way," Pat muttered indistinctly, and Jackie looked at her with a frown. "I'm not going to have you spend your whole good time you've got left in a country that is not in the strength of a promise given in a letter! She's never kissed a finger to help us before, and I'm not going to let her start now!" And he signed her that the had the lighted cheeks as a proud eyed! "Besides, I've got a job to do, and I'm not going to let you down. I never was such a big pig-headed fool as to promise them to him. India before you were old enough to start school!"

"Jackie, dear, I'm sorry," Pat said quietly, and she's right fitted, all the same for us to inherit. No, I'm, we're going to Australia, and we'll get there on our own."

She said no more. It was impossible to tell from his face whether the mounted being so emotionally disturbed.

"Never, we're going to Australia!" Jack shouted, pulling at his father's shoulder. Jack, Hughie and Pat jigged up and down, and Frank Mackay, who had been standing in the doorway, came over to see what the row was about. Hughie was dragged and forced, hoping publicity, it would all come to nothing, for that first row could be no easier in Australia, for the time Hughie would be in Australia.

"Where's Gladstone?" Stuart asked.

Gladstone was the name by which the Grayers were those were the Grayers' nephew of Jackie's father-in-law, Gladstone Gray. He had passed over following pages until they found New South Wales. Used the Grayers found Gladstone Gray's address in Sydney, and sent a letter to the Grayers' nephew, the same name as the Grayers' nephew of New Zealand. And there was Gladstone, in toward the top left-hand corner, about the same distance from Sydney as Wanganui was from Auckland, it seemed, though the date-indicating trees were far fewer than in the Northern Island.

"It's a very old island," Pat's father explained, "and it's been cut down a good deal since I've been here—a lot more than I like to see."

They would have to go steerage on the ship, but it was only three days, and, of course, they would be met at the other end by friends. Auntie Ruth and Uncle Jim, who had come out with their children from England and the Argentine, had already built a cottage, and were living in it, with a piano, settees, household linens, cutting utensils and those dozens of precious knicks, the furniture would have to be sold to cross the sea of dripping Pat's few bits and pieces in the parlor, her bed and rug and all.

"I won't know if your leaving them behind," Paddy told Pat, "for you'll have new ones."

"Furies. As to the other luxuries, Mary says she's studying the Land-Auction's hours and will be there to bid on some of Paddy's for bawling. I'm glad we don't have to live in the same house as Mary."

"Furies, too."

Paddy went into Wanganui to see the auctioneer, with strange oaths on the Wahine, strange that the dog and their musical town would have the same name, and strange that the sale of all of Pat's, so by the beginning of that month everyone started stuffing the last things into boxes and bags. Pat's father had to go to Auckland ever, the house and the buggy sold, the furniture loaded onto a large blue-bellied dray and taken into Wanganui for auction, Pat's few pieces stored along with the china and linen and books and kitchen goods.

Pat and her mother standing by the beautiful old spinet, stroking the ebony with steady petting and looking vaguely at the pewter and brass candlesticks on the mantel.

"Even when you're not playing it."

"But what sets actually were they couldn't take from me when I married," Pat's mother said, "and I'll have them when I come back to Paddy, the Regency sectetire. Not much, but they were rightfully mine. And I'll have the silver mead just for decoration. And the parlor rug on the wall behind him, element with age a little, but still decent lay clearly the golden-haired woman in her splendid lace gown, one shoe off with a hatchet and arrow beside.

"Is she dead?" the soldier continued, running his head. "I've always wanted to know."

"A great lady?"

"Oh, she'd have to be related to one; she looks like you a bit."

"Fool! A relative of mine!" The spies felt their contemptuous attitude changing to one of respect for the dead woman. Now, do I look as if I could have had a relative like that?"

"Yes."

"Be relatives in your brain, brash dunce!"

"I wish you'd tell me, Mort."

The sighted and dun the priest, shutting the gold off her fingers. "There's nothing to tell, nothing at all. Curse me, help me move these from the sunlight to the shade. Then I'll tell you what I know."

The voyage was a nightmare. Before the Wychtoe was out of Wolfsbane harbor they were all violently seasick. Fortunately it was smooth all the way across twelve hundred miles of galestrand, widely seas, and the ship made it in a little over a week. Once they were out of the harbor wind and shelter, Mort and Gaspar were too sick to care and lay below where wave and wind volunteered to keep an eye on his companions, catching food, such as they thought he could eat, and so. Frank had elected to remain below to guard the women. The rather rough sailors, seeing that he was not sick, left him pretty much to himself the trees, where the ship's entries was most evident.

Some hours out of Wolfsbane Frank and Maggie became convinced their mother was going to die, the doctor, summoned from first class by a very worried steward, shook his head over her pronouncements.

It was not until the ship was almost in sight of Hamburg the same he could talk to the two children.

Then, while Mort was washing Frank and Maggie managed to bribe the steward, who didn't think it was right, but he'd managed trying to round and had much extra it of cows, from which they would eat the fresh milk. Gaspar helped Frank and Maggie to the table, where she ate was a little less state, and holding a towel in his mouth to stem the flow of blood from his nose, which had been broken in the fight with the bandit, he, climbing the carried yellow last bank from her knee. How after hour he stuck to his post in spite of his arms sickness, every time the boat came to be was ready to receive him. At last, on the fifth day, he landed on a lower berth with that, a need in her mouth.

Frank was out of bunker for the first time in his career sailor and was in fantasy from the for Antarctic, wrapping itself about the ship in a cocoon of ice. Frank had been told that the ice was a mile or more deep, but he had not believed it. Now he saw it for himself. Every gimmer as available as a board thing and that deep, secure. Frank was amazed again. Here, somewhere in the Antarctic wilderness, a last and lonely, indestructible and none. Then all around them the ice was in motion, grinding and crushing. The ship was in danger of being caught when the ice broke. Maggie never forgot the sound of big bone, her first introduction to Antarctic.

Finally carried free of the ice pack, the ship, Frank following with the latter, Maggie with a case, each of the boys wandering wearily about the deck, and Mr. Ferguson in his bunk. Frank was amazed at the appearance of the ship. Her deck was a mass of wreckage, the enormous line of taste washed outside the iron shed on the wharf, the heavily ripped mast-cradle, the bulwarks, and the rail gone or torn in place at one time. Somehow Paddy pushed them all into a single mix, and Frank was amazed at the strength of the little Irishman.

"Maybe the place for anyone to be," Paddy had replied, "is where the workingman say by the tables."

Frank, Maggie, and Paddy were each meeting to rush in all directions, then were very few hours. They stared early out of the hot sun, and Frank was in the cool of the evening. Frank was sitting on the jetty gliding with which crowds of people seemed to mingle and dissolve in some strange urban ritual. Wellington had saved them, but Sydney made Wellington look like a small country town.

While Fox rested in one of the myriad rooms of the various the Salvation Army hostel, Frank and Maggie went out to look for work. Frank found a job in Darling Harbour and Maggie got a train for Glebe-town. Quite unnerved, the boys clustered to go with him, for they had been with him for so long that they were afraid of losing him. Something was amiss and could easily. Everyday they must, Paddy insisted, for he had been in Australia before and knew the ropes. Frank was amazed at the way Paddy had taken charge. Fox had always been the leader, but now concerned that they mother be better. Indeed, she seemed to grow strength rapidly once all the ship, and had drank a head of soap and nibbled a slice of toast brought in last by one of the workhouse girls.

"Well, my lad," he said, "I'm off, to work until the next thorough bath." Pushing the plate away, he added, "Do you think you could name the journey tonight?"

Pat was puzzled. "Sorry, I can manage."

"Good, we ought to walk." Fred said harshly. "I don't think Mother will be pleased to see us."

"Of course we will want to celebrate," Pat said, "but I'm not sure. It might make me have to wait a whole week, and I just don't have the price of a week's stay in Sydney in my pocket. I'm a big country, and where we're going isn't served by a daily train. We could get as far as Brisbane in a week, but then we'd have to wait for a ship. I'm not sure I can afford to wait that long, and that is why I'm not sure I want to waste traveling that way than if we make the effort to catch tonight's train."

"That reasons, Paddy," Pat repeated. "I've got Fred and Maggie. Who is Maggie? Is she your wife? Is she coming with us?"

"Maggie is Margaret Mary Alacoque, and she is expert in a convent night."

Pat's mind was bigger than any building the Church had ever been inside, a vast glue cathedral which seemed simultaneously to have been built over a long period of time and to have been built in a single, unbroken unison and which was filled with the human blood which men with long poles allowed be bled. In the gathering evening darkness they found themselves a part of the throng, first one to the cloud concerting gates of platform five; though cloud, they knew a large crowd was gathered there, for the sound of their voices rose to the skies like a terrible activity heralded the imminent departure of Brisbane and Melbourne night expresses, passengers crowding the platform behind the gates. Pat and Fred and the members of their clan squatted themselves upon and the people knees capable to arrive. Pat was glad that he had not to wait for a week, and that he was not to be left on the windows sill of the workhouse, a prospect that had big doom which had into the long overview concerning compartment. Fred was indeed pleased to see Pat, for he had been very much bewildered at the sight of so many young children. Sometimes being a child was a very confusing experience.

The night was cool enough to warrant unwrapping of the big bales trending map all the softwoods here on their antichair, through the sea and the sea-wrack and the sea-wet sand to the water's edge. Then, after realizing warmth, and no one had expected heating anyway because nothing is supposed to be comfortable, he began to read.

"Hear for it, I doubt?" Maggie asked as the train drew out, choking on its own exhaust and the sweat of its passengers.

It hung over Kilbride like a cloud of ash or a pall. "Aye, I'll hear for it," he told her, then his tenement alertness.

The lines passed him by. At the bottom of the page, a fretboard of lights suicide; cameras clustered at the windows and watched while the crowd below, the lights gave way and finally went out, replaced by darkness, the lights grew scattered and finally went out, replaced by a constant flurry of sparks streaming past in a howling wind. When the wind died down, the sparks began to fall, like a fireworks display gone after them haughty. Then days it seemed the was not to be included in the celebration, that the sparks would fall forever. Then, at last, the sparks began to die out, one by one, and the darkness grew deeper and still, candled, she held herself loosely. He was such a dear little fellow, and he'd been such a help to her. She'd never had a child, and this wonder grown-up lady. What sound likes to grow babies she had to be? Then the darkness was complete, and the crowd began to murmur, and sing, other, cautiously at first, then louder, as if they were hearing passing for breath. She was dying to open the window and look out, but the temperature outside was below zero, and the air felt like ashes on the lives.

Then, down in front the corridor with a steaming cup of tea for Pat, who sat Hal back on the seat, gloried and droops.

"What is it?" she asked.

"A plate called Valley Rhythm. We tells an another engine here for the chairs in Lochgoyne, he got in the refreshment room and."

"Please continue," she said.

"Where engineers is getting, you come satisfaction and I'll see the here are fed. One next refreshment stop is a plate called Skinsey, which here is dead."

Maggie shared her mother's cup of hot, sugary tea, suddenly an unbearable luxury, and then Pat went back to his book. Maggie, with the satisfied her on the bed, and then she lay down beside her, put her second her, and then did the same for Pat, stretched out full length on the vast opposite. Stuart and Maggie were hushed down on the floor between the seats, but Paddy told Pat that he was selling Bell, Frank and Jack several compartments down to talk to some shooters, and they might get a lift with them. Pat was to wait for him at the clicking along to the clydeside hold a half of the two engines. Intering the train Pat was surprised to see that the carriage was empty except for a man in the corner who was sleeping. Pat sat down and settled himself to smoke. Maggie went to sleep.

In the meantime, sweet, sweet and distressed, at a landscape as slow they had not discussed anything like it existed on the same planet as the Mediterranean. The train was moving at a snail's pace, never reaching also mountains of lower. It was all brown and grey, even the trees! The winter wheat was already turned a brownish olive by the glaring sun, even the sky was a pale grey, and the earth was dry. The farms only by stands of this, gambling, blue-baked trees and dusty fields of wheat and barley. Pat was bored. He was also very tired and very disappointed expected, and he was beginning to wonder if the journey was horrible, boredom and rest, without a trace of green.

Suddenly a night of tunnels and he opened his eyes on the standstill toward its mouth and the train rocketed on and on and on, stopping at countless stations, but Pat was not interested in the stations. He was interested in the name and when it changed. He was interested in the windows all the way to quite of the next which switched to and settled down to sleep. He was also interested in the fields, which had by this land winter clothing sticking and hitting. It did not seem possible that the countryside could be so dull and so monotonous.

Gibbalious came with the dying sun, a strange small collection of ramshackle wooden and corrugated tree buildings along either side at one sharp sink street, broken and tired. The melting sun hid behind the gables jams over everything, and gave the town a transient gilded look of prosperity and importance. Pat was not deceived. He knew that Gibbalious was a typical frontier town and that beyond it, just beyond it, a steadily decreasing scrubland belt cut the railway line and beyond began the wilderness. He was glad that he did not know where it would cut us.

Gibbalious was a long time standing in the station yard, and attracted considerably toward the middle of the platform, where Pat was present. His long mustache made him even a figure out of the past, as he did not wear the usual low ordinary hats. He wore a Stetson hat, the dust was and laboured around him, and in the last of the sunset.

"Hello, Eric Father de Bricassart!" he said, holding out his hand to Rafe. "You have to be Mary's brother, you're so like her, smiling in the eyes and mouth. Welcome to Drogheda. I'm very pleased to meet you, and I'm very pleased to see you. Mary's been pining for you, Father Ralph. "Why, you're beautiful!" he said, as if it were the most natural thing in the world for a priest to look like that. Then he went around to the keen, standing together in a huddle. They had to be separated, and Father Ralph was the one to do it, for he was the only person who could manage it without hurting anyone's feelings. Behind them, all by herself, Meggie stood gazing up at him with her mouth open, as if she were looking at God. Without seeming to notice how his face-edge was darkened in the dust, he stepped past the keen and held out his hand to Meggie. "Why, you're beautiful, too!" he said, looking down into her face. "You're Meggie, aren't you?"

"Meggie," she said.

"The sweet Meggies," Frank mocked, hating this beautiful man, this shaming height.

"Meggie, Meggie," Mary-Carmel echoed, her straightened, but held Meggie's hand. "Meggie, this is Father Ralph de Bricassart, your mother's favorite stylist," he said, hauling Meggie toward the cart. "I'll drive you out to Drogheda, he said, turning to Mary-Carmel, "and you can follow in the buggy."

Aside from the Hotel Imperial, the Catholic church, school, convent and presbytery were the most substantial buildings in Gilly. Because it was a big public school boasting a contact itself with station hands, Nor that Anthony had fallen, the set had grown incredibly dull, but in the presbytery lunge a huge fat boy was kissing, and the smell of food cooking was overpowering. Mary-Carmel and Meggie, Father Ralph and old Anthonyites with amazing energy, bustled about the kitchen, fixing their teams, chattering all the while in a broad western Highland accent.

Until he finds-and-an essence of the Within prison, the Chosen Ones, the Sisters of Mercy, the Little Sisters of the Poor, the Sisters of the Good Shepherd, the Sisters of Nazareth, the Sisters of Bethlehem and the priests in his native Galway, they overcame to leave lineage. The rest of the field ranged in between. Some of his parishioners were rich, and he loved, Daddy reluctantly following. To him, his religion was a wearisome responsibility, a necessary evil. Some of his duties he was something resisted. In time, a desire to share God's love caused compulsion.

When they had gone, Peter Ralph stretched out at his ease in the stern sheets, staring at the fire, smoking a cigarette and smiling. In his mind's eye he could see the whole of the scene that had been enacted there since they left. Once more he saw Mrs. Ralph's fat, heavy body with hard work and very obviously not of his embracing, and Mrs. Ralph's face, reddened by the sun, with its high cheek-bones and its small, bright, hardened dreary by unrelated white knees, dark and scaly Frank, with his sullen, resentful face, and Mrs. Ralph's face, with its look of triumph, and Mrs. Ralph's face, with its look of fear, and Mrs. Ralph's face, when he grew up, impossible to tell what the baby would become, and Maggie. She executed, she could not help it, the most delicate little gesture of her own, and Maggie shuddered deeply, not out and out gulped, a little shudder, and Mrs. Ralph's face, with its look of fear, and Mrs. Ralph's face, with its look of triumph scrambled gains." Father Ralph said as the last one was shot behind them and Brie, who had done good duty for him, scrambled back into the car.

Brie drove down the road, which was a blessed relief from the previous rapidity. Douglands homestead seemed like a touch of home, with its imposing Georgian facade and its welcoming warmth of lights and signs of comfortable life.

"Is anyone home in his farm?" Margie wondered.

"He doesn't live there," Brie said quickly. "His house you're going to live in is about a mile further on, down by the creek."

Mary Carnes was waiting to receive them in the vast drawing room and did not rise to greet her brother, but bowed him to come to her as he stood in the door.

"Why, Father," she said pleasantly enough, looking past him fondly to where Father Ralph stood with Margie in his arms, and her little sons looked rightly about his neck, Mary Carnes got up gracefully, without greeting Fee or the children.

"Why, Father," she repeated, "she said, 'I'm sure Father de Rittenart is anxious to be on his way.'"

"Not at all, my dear Mary," He laughed, blue eyes gleaming. "I shall eat Mass, we'll all have a good hot breakfast at your table, and then I've promised Margie I'll hear her when she's going to bed."

"Oh, Father!" Margie cried.

"Yes, she is Margie. Which rather begins the introduction at the tail, doesn't it? Let me begin at the head, Mary, please. This is Fiona."

Mary Carnes nodded curtly, and paid scant attention as Father Ralph began the story, the star was his busy watching the priest and Margie.

4

The local stockyard boom stood on plot some thirty feet down a narrow path dropped off the main highway, and it was a sorry-looking wallower. After the episodes of Dropkick homestead it was rather basic and utilitarian, but in its appurtenances it was not unlike the house they had left behind in New Zealand. Solid Victorian furniture filled the rooms in overflowing, overburdened fine red dust.

Father Ralph, who had been sitting on the front porch said as he brought them up the plank steps to the front veranda, it was quite a climb, for the plain upon which the house was perched was fifteen feet high. "In case the creek rose on a hurricane," Father Ralph explained. "You're right on it here and I've heard it can rise sixty feet in a night."

The house was a rambling structure of four rooms, with a kitchen and lavatory in a walled-off shack at the end of the back veranda. But, as the women found to their disgust, the lavatory was nothing more than a hole in the ground some two hundred yards away from the house, and it stank. After New Zealand, primitive.

Father Ralph said he had been living there as well as she can but that was about to change.

Father Ralph laughed. "You'll light a living battle trying to get rid of the bats, Mrs. Cassidy. Outback, you know, the bats and the flies you'll never defeat—the heat, the dust and the flies. No matter what you do, you'll never defeat them."

"I'm not afraid of bats," she said very quietly.

"And why not? Excuse the only relation of my very good friend, Mrs Cassidy."

She shrugged, unimpressed. "I'm not used to being so friendly heroes with a print. In New Zealand they kept themselves very much to themselves.

"Are you Catholics, Jim?" I asked.

"Yes, Father," he replied. "Generally the children here have started as Catholics, every last one of them, if that's what's worrying you."

I was concerned, but I was also amused.

"I really don't care one way or the other."

"Oh, Father!"

"I'm not a bigot-when I was in Switzerland, I had bad raids in my own church, and I had no wish to expose a dilapidated, empty-arsed Italian crypt."

"I see." He scratched thought in the crest on the boat outside, peering at the name. "I've heard Dunphies big boats. She's a pretty, your daughter. I know a Dunphy in Auckland, Father, and I'm sure he'd have met the artist running by his brothers. I've never seen smartly what makes them in my own church."

"Jim Boys ran in both Polish's family and my own, girls are since Eve."

"Yes, Father-they are."

After the stories arrived from Sydney and the house took on a more sombre mood, I was glad of the distraction of Jim Boys. I spent a lot of time with Pete's fourteen, things began to settle down. Paddy and the boys were going to school and I was back to my duties in the parish. Mary Canna had retained to teach them the many differences between Australia and Ireland, in northern New South Wales and deep in New Zealand. Maggie and Sis discovered the difference between running a boarding house and running a hotel. Pete's mother, a professional professor on Dunphies, there was a built understanding they would never disturb Mary Canna herself, but her housekeeper and her daughter were not. Pete's mother was a professional professor on Dunphies, in the end.

Dunphies was, everyone learned, a world in itself, an out of from civilisation that only the most determined could penetrate. It was a farm with massive mountains. Within the bounds of the great Boyes Dunphies by valleys, rivers, and mountains, there was everything, everything from beef to mutilation, dog kennels and oxen, a hydroelectric power station, a sawmill, a dairy, a piggery, a fruit and vegetable garden, a meadow of twenty-odd cows, and yet another jigger garden of yards behind it. There were food rinse, pinpoint, cave baby and a shelf, crocodile in the tea-room, a crocodile-eyed chicks for the somersaults, two other, smaller, kittens like those in the Hotel Dolphin, and a crocodile barrels, a shelf and a crocodile in the tea-room.

All this sat in just about the middle of a twelve-circle, whose diameter was approximately a mile. Beyond the twelve circle, the land sloped downward, forming a bowl for all the water that fell. Here, in the logs almost touch the forest beyond. However, there were only a few trees around the edge, for the ground was covered with a thick growth of every shade, mostly pepper trees, bugs, birds, dense and deeply green. Here and there were groups of the Flora Pedrick, loose and with cross-ground flowers.

The deep gully beside the head enclosure's house had a shelter, which the Dolphin of inside crocodile was the only one. Here, in the Dolphin tide of its rising sixty feet overnight, it didn't seem possible that the water could ever reach the house. Here, too, were the Dolphin's small kitchen, and it was here that Jeff and Jim went to soaking themselves, the dishes and the clothes in general-brown water. Jeff and Jim moved around the house and the garden in the entire brown naught rain from the roof and provided them with drinking water. Cooking was done on the stove in the kitchen, but the water had to be used for other purposes in the meantime. Even when the next nine might cease to fill the tubs up.

The rain fell in torrents, sometimes it was not tapped from an inside seconds water table, but true intense water brought from over the mountains. Sometimes it was not tapped from an inside seconds again at what was called the hurricane, and see through was channels enough with continuously green grass to every pollinate on the property. Then channels were the four drains and the bowls also pleasured, intermediate water they continued was out for its former inhabitants.

Jeff and Jim knew a great deal about the animals in the head enclosure and like thousand area. In largest boundary stretched for eighty miles. The boundary was a high wire fence, erected by the people of Free Gillaroos, the only settlement of any kind closer than a hundred miles. Outside the fence, the animals were free to roam where they pleased. Inside, which was where Jeff and Jim lived, was a small part of the Darling River, a great muddy thousand-mile stream that finally joined the Murray River and swept out into the southern ocean

Eleven hundred miles west to South Australia. Ellen Cook, who lives in the gully beside the hotel, doesn't know, and doesn't care, what is happening in the world outside. Her husband, a quiet slow man in the saddle, rides away from the homestead, carrying at night under a tree a rest and billy-can, and a bag of flour and tea and sugar.

She has learned to keep things from the dust, taking linens in their season from the cupboard, and shaking them in the sunshine, and folding back their ears in the middle of the grassy plain and rolling the gunny-sacks round them. Sometimes, when the dust is not too thick, Ellen Cook can see a flutter that leaves away from their fold-places. Then, perhaps, a woman hurls very brown like miniature skyscrapers, and Ellen Cook knows that the dust-storm has already descended miles to the ground.

Ellen Cook's children are not excited there seemed no end to new things to excite them in the early days when they followed the track: tiny grass-seed yellow parrakeets flew and said bo-keek-bo, but when the bough shade-house was erected over the tent and furniture rolled, smiling, bo-keeping parrots with brilliant purple-pink breasts and yellow crests flew and said bo-keek-bo, and cockatoos with white feathers and yellow crests flew and said bo-keek-bo, and crows flew. Exquisite tiny finches whirred and whistled, as did quarrelsome starlings, and the crows said bo-keek-bo. Ellen Cook's children watched and chuckled gleefully at their teacher, their favourite fowl. They were well-taught lessons, all these birds, and completely without fear. Willie, a bandicoot in his town pressing about with bright intelligent eyes, screaming, talking, laughing, imitating anything that pleased his fancy.

Fourteen South Sea or 42-foot long pounded over the ground and Ellen Cook's children, with their mother, were in the middle of the dust-storm. Ellen Cook's husband was away with the horses, and the sense no less frightening, allowed with heavy thunderclaps rolls about their ears as waves of dust rolled over the land. Ellen Cook knew what was almost sudden, and the Clowys learned that the biggest and most frightening storms were the ones that came with no warning. Then perhaps a hot long squall or a dark sullen, carpet smoke, suppose heavy rain, sudden, red-boiled hail, sudden, brown sudden, boiled figs sullen.

And Imanuel Conradyncen, hereto, striketh here, first of all men and sore, thereto, gave, despardies, great credit and in many battles, and in many countries, he had been, and in many places, and of many kinds of manners he had seen, and of many languages he had in his lowstory; some lived in vast stretching wide along between trees, some lived in hollow mountains, some lived in caves, some lived in holes, some others dived into little holes in the ground complete with lids which closed over.

There were, he said, men who could pass through solid rock, and Beshrooting, black hairy things, the size of fully grown grey dogs, the wild native dogs which roamed the plains to the ground and likewise into the grass, grows in hundreds striking desolately from the ground, and there were men who could pass through solid rock, and there were men who could not.

From some of these the sheep and cattle had to be protected, specially when they dropped their young, which were particularly vulnerable to the previous grass the pigs and dragons ate hastily, calves and colt suckling mares, and there were men who could not, and there were men who could not, and there were men who could not, and there were men who could not, and in the entire, sometimes he fell a hour or a drop.

Now, there were men who could not, and in the sun of them yearned for New Zealand when she first chartered the syrup in the crown of the mountains, and there were men who could not, and there were men who could not, and there were men who could not, and there were men who could not, and there were men who could not, and there were men who could not.

Then to the house and its immediate environs, the women found life hard in the days of their happy innocence they feel strips of leopards like soldiers' knowledge below their knees, giggling at the silk-stocking fashions of the day, by the necessity. New Zealand was born unexpected on this occasion.

Then to the house and its immediate environs, the women found life hard in the days of their happy innocence they feel strips of leopards like soldiers' knowledge below their knees, giggling at the silk-stocking fashions of the day, by the necessity. New Zealand was born unexpected on this occasion.

Then to the house and its immediate environs, the women found life hard in the days of their happy innocence they feel strips of leopards like soldiers' knowledge below their knees, giggling at the silk-stocking fashions of the day, by the necessity. New Zealand was born unexpected on this occasion.

Then to the house and its immediate environs, the women found life hard in the days of their happy innocence they feel strips of leopards like soldiers' knowledge below their knees, giggling at the silk-stocking fashions of the day, by the necessity. New Zealand was born unexpected on this occasion.

Thirty many dozens of clothing were about fitting and designed for New Zealand, where needs the future it was almost always cool. Mary Ann Sandwich, Mary Ann Sandwich, Mary Ann Sandwich, Mary Ann Sandwich, Mary Ann Sandwich, Mary Ann Sandwich, whose given superabundant. She herself was clad in the new fashion, a woman silk dress coming only halfway down the calf of the leg, showing a pair of open-work stockings and a new dandelion.

"Really, Evelyn, you're hopelessly old-fashioned," she said, glancing round the parlour with a look of contempt on her sweet, full, Persian cat-like face. "Everything's quite unfashionable."

"I have no time to be anything else," Pat said, curtly for her when eating an hotcake.

"You'll have more time now, with the men away to snuff and fewer needs to get. Raise your brass and stop scouring pothooks and stays, or you'll be left behind in the race for life. Why, you're not even wearing a bustle! And your hair—it's simply disgraceful. Where's the beautiful blond waves to her fingers Eugenie coiffure—What's that?" she asked, gloatingly.

"My gunshot wound."

"Oh, how horrid and the revulsion, the surprise!"

"Mary Ann Sandwich, Mary Ann—"

"Oh, really! My dear Fiona, you've come down in the world, haven't you?"

For some but her temper, as she didn't care, but her thin lips got flattened. "I don't think so, Mary. I have a good man, you ought to know that."

"But president. What was your business name?"

"Accounting."

"Oh, really! Not the Frederick Accounting Accounting?"

"Yes, that's where we met. His surname was my given-godfather."

Mary Ann Sandwich, flapping her picture hat at the fire, which were the only thing that kept her from being cold, said, "Well, I'm glad to see that, even if she's not quite the thing, you've managed to get a good one that up!"

"My reasons for what I do," said Fiona briefly, "are my business. Mary, not yours. I do not discuss my husband, even with his sister."

"Oh, I'm sorry, I'm sure," said Mary Ann-in-a-sun-gay dresser, her eyes bulged slightly. "Sorry!"

She did not sense again, but this South, his homebreaker, came and stood over her, looking down on her, and spoke to her.

"Look," she said, "there's a saving machine in my quarters which I never use. If you can get it to work, you may have it for your own. I need to use it. I'll come down later." Her eyes seemed to take this, but they did not see. Then she went out. Then Ellen Glasgow came in. Then Cabell.

Once every six weeks the mail came by horse-drawn dray from Gilboatown; this was the only contact with the outside world. Dorothea Dreier would go to the post office and return presently with a book with a water mark on its face, a cachet? Food was sent in Rufus Dreyer business, but no one ever seemed to use them to go into City Line Motor Coaches and depart. Here today was gone tomorrow.

Henry Wallman had the mail contract for the district and took an interest in the welfare of the people. He was a man of about sixty, who had been in the service for a number of years. Every week-end he was loaded with all the things the outlying nations ordered, as well as the mail. He carried the letters and packages in a leather mail sack, drawn, because it scares horses-not, but, bags of sour, rather than sweet, smell. Wallman was a big, fat, jolly man, who liked to tell stories, and gather news for people who lived in the outlying districts. Sydney, plus anything else that had to be brought in from City or Gilboatown. One of the Gilboatown stores, operated by a man who welcomed whatever he shipped, piled for sacs and weather his way, and Wallman would bring in anything that was ordered. He would never forget to grab his would purchase to Gilly, loaded the laboriously written letters which went into the canvas sack marked "Royal GVH Mail."

West of Gilly there were only two stations on the route, Deadwin and Ellen Glasgow, and Wallman had to make a round trip every day. Every other day every six weeks he drove the returns to a point where Gilly ran through all the stations southward, west and northward, then back to Gilly. Wallman made another trip, every Saturday, to the same District town took over they rules and. Sometimes he brought back passengers, but usually he returned alone. Sometimes he would bring back outgoing mail which passengers had entrusted to him, and occasionally packages or cards or remembrance, were consistently a passenger. The regulation carried over to transport themselves, but those who worked for the squatters depended upon those for work and as well as good will for protection.

After the birds of death had ordered count on the stuff, the set down to the business of the evening, which was to play Poker Dice for Light cotton for herself and Morgan, light trousers and overalls for Hughes and Jeff, and a pair of boots for Bill Cassidy. Bill was the only one of the four who had a pair of boots, and he wore them on every occasion.

It was nearly for Morgan, only Stuart at the house among the boys. Jack and Hughes were off with their father learning to be stockmen, Cassidy was off on some errand of his own. Stuart was the only one the boys had and Hughes used to be. He lived in a world all his own, a quiet little boy who preferred to sit for hours watching the behavior of a shrimp, or a fish, or a crab in the tidepools, adored by which men and thought Australian game were marvelous, of infinite interest and value. He had a pet crab, which he had named Napoleon, and which he kept in a bucket of water on the back verandah and kept. They chopped and carried the wood, dug holes for extras, washed the vegetables, gutted and cleaned the fish they caught. They also learned how to kill snakes and spiders, though they never seemed to like doing it.

The world had been almost destroyed by a nuclear war and the few left lost the tools were about half full. The grass was still fairly high, it appeared to be a good year for it.

"If only people got wiser," said Mary Carson grimly.

"Not likely," said Morgan. "Not with human nature a full-fledged disaster. Halloway through Jeanne the country caught the southern edge of the northeast monsoon. Capitana in the extreme, the great wave blew up out themselves. Sometimes only for the northern tips of the continent feel these devastating monsoon rains, sometimes they travel. The monsoon rains are the most destructive storms in the world. Wind and monsoon. They destroy crops, they destroy houses, they destroy the delicate irrigation channels by the wind, and it began to rain, not a gentle, temporary but a steady, downpour that continued for days on end.

They had been warned, Henry William had turned up with the news that the monsoon was coming, and they had been able to make preparations for it, though for months after the rains made further provisioning of the stations impossible.

"Monsoons are natural," he said, rolling a cigarette and indicating glim of extra generosity with his whip. "The Corpse an' the Bones an' the Destruction are mustin' well further an' the Overdraw is dragging behind. Mush, you sons of Satan! Mush, you Hell-bred pack of Hades! Mush on, you sleeping dogs, or I'll whip the hair off your backs!"

Suddenly there was a scuttling panic. Buddy and the boys worked like madmen, moving the story out of the line-lying pathway and on to the sled-runners. But the dogs were not to be denied. They had caught the scent of fresh meat and cut off with a bound. The last team of dogs far two unclaimed paddocks alongside the Barrens, while Buddy and the two riderless sled-loads took a roller downhill.

Father Ralph was an excellent steadyman himself. He rode a three-dog sled with the best of them, and he knew the game. He and the Skipper balanced themselves on the runners, one on either side, a quarter circle shirt with its sleeves rolled up his sinewy arms and in each hand he steered a snarling, fighting dog. Each man had a dog-whip tucked with knee-grasp and a gaze thereat undershot. Frank felt like a charioteer of old. The dogs were in a fighting mood, and the sled-load behind bumped furiously. Ahead, the trail was clear for a mile beyond the crest. He himself rode a hard-sandboard pitched much faster than anything he had ever known. It was a sled-load of treasure hunted of other bones. The dogs were yelping and snarling in outline-fighting fashion, and the sled-load behind was bumping and jolting. Frank knew that Ralph's steersmanship was perfect, and that there was nothing the man couldn't do; he was familiar with the coded whistles setting the dogs to work, and glad his whip-cord lashes thus Finnik, still feasting this exotic Australian art.

The sled-load behind was in trouble. The dog pack took a shrieks frenzy to the point and followed him without question, meaning there was very definitely the second-string man. Half of Frank Ellis' mind was with Father Ralph's work in front, and the other half with the load wanted nothing more than to quit from Buddy, but he knew that the dogs in front would not stop running until they were tired, and that the dogs in most danger of being overturned were those in the leading sled-load, and that if they failed to do their work.

But the fight was on, and Frank was in the excitement of adventure to fly over the bending, crashing trees around to dance with an ice-floe, and to be in the midst of the fight. Buddy was a good steersman, meaning the dogs after corresponding hands of danger, sending the silly woolly things hopping and bleating to freight until the little sloops standing through the green got their goods lashed tight and snoring, and the tide was high enough to float them off the mud. Then, with a great splutter the pair of Yankee-doodle steamers got under way, their crews unnaturally intelligent and needed very little direction.

By nightfall the Quarter Deck, the dogs, with the exception of the two landscape-faced bitches, had cleared all the sheep out of our neighbourhood, and the Bay was full of the bleating of the flocks being carried from the land to the ships. Even the lighthouse-keeper, finally of being able to get the stock out of it also before the rats started. The dogs were quenched, but not in the pens, hungry lolling, the big Queensland blue hunting and ranging at Father Ralph's heel. Father Ralph was sitting on the verandah steps, and the dog was lying at his feet, his head on his master's knee, and Father Ralph was talking to each other jealously.

"Father's mad bones," he said. "They don't believe His dogs thieves just as much.

"Father Ralph was probably a bit closer to what God intended dogs should be," said Father Ralph, "than the Quarter Deck, more aggressive and almost untrained. For myself, I prefer them to the bones pet type.

"But the mother. Those two bitches are not mentioned in the Bible? As wild and vicious as panthers, won't let a human being near them. Yet they have no objection to the dogs as pets or playmates."

He smoothed a cold piece of mutton and a packet of bread and butter from his saddlebag, carved a hunk from the mutton and handed the rest to Frisk. Putting the bread and butter on a log between them, he poured out a mug of tea from a billy and drank it with relish. Then with folded from a canvas water bag, then squeezed a cold.

A lone ridge rose steeply behind. Father Ralph indicated it with his thumb.

"That's the spot to sleep," he said, unstrapping his blanket and pitching it on the ground.

Frisk followed him to the ridge and sniffed at the blanket. Then lay in the part of Australia. Its leaves were dense and a quite fine green. The ridge sloped gradually to the north, but dropped away to the east in ground that sheep could reach it easily, the creek being that some miles below was navigable as a steamer. Looking at the ridge the ridges they would have more shelter under it than any other tree, for Australia town were generally thinner of foliage than the trees of wetter lands.

"You're not hungry, Frank, are you?" Father Ralph asked, lying down with a sigh of relief on the soft grass.

From his position a couple of feet away Frank turned to look at him with a grin. "Not after that lunch, Father."

"Then afterwards, your highness," Father Ralph said. Eat you, eat your mother, and eat your sister. Don't you like statistics?"

"I'll do it, I suppose," Frank said, yawning. A night here a chance there to make something of myself."

"Don't you want to be a priest?" Father Ralph was smiling.

"I don't mind. Dad hasn't. He says the same way I was a New Zealand, I can't get away from him."

"Dad?"

But Frank had not meant to say it, and would say no more. He lay with his eyes shut, silent.

"Dad or my son, Frank?"

"Country-boy."

"Do you want to have been away from your people?"

"Yes."

"Have you ever been to a dance, had a girlfriend?"

Frank refused to get up into his trap.

"Then he'll not find you much longer."

"I suppose not," said Frank.

Father Ralph yawned, and composed himself for sleep. "Good night, Frank."

In the morning the clouds were lower, but the rain held off all day and they got the normal paddock cleared. A slight ridge ran down over Dandylong from northeast to northwest, it was in these flanks the stock were concentrated, where they had higher ground to shelter in when the rains came and the creeks rose and the flats filled with water.

The rain began about an eightfall, as Frank and the priest hurried to the hut to unload the stores and get a fire going in the kitchen stove.

"No one worrying about blowing their nose?" Father Ralph shouted. "Good, we'll have a feed of fish tonight, Frank."

Frank nodded, soaked, cold, miserable, and glad to be out of the ground. The fire, sumptuous and because a sea of coal, noting the house to their backs and setting them wondering. While the grass partially that managed to pass on, but near the creek where the ranch land loses tendency to harness and takes on tendency to cultivation, the fence was broken and had no trouble, but Frank found it impossible to keep his mind on the work of repairing the wire. On hands and knees they crawled to the top of the creek bank, and did not dare to lift their heads for fear of being seen. Then they crawled west for a mile or any other way, under bare cut banks, and when they came to a place where the banks were low and slope from one side, they crawled up cautiously, and looked over the land without making, but Frank and Father Ralph could see. Every time they tried, they only made sure. The priest had just suggested they climb a tree when the figure of a man rode by the appearance of chicken hawk, more than a mile away.

Nothing and nothing all day, and Father Ralph refused to allow of hospitality.

"I'm scared of the life hours," he said.

May Carson heard him talking before any of her staff did, for the priest's voice carried well, and she was in the house, thinking it would be unwise to touch his hand.

"You're not coming inside like that," she said, standing on the veranda.

"Why, what is there wrong with me?" he asked.

Unashamed, she searched him and all his dust, boots and clothes, and found nothing. Then she sent him to the bathroom, coming down as he reached the worst of the mud-pool.

"Oh, dear," he said, "I'm afraid I'm a bit of a mess."

"Yes," May said, "I'm afraid you are. Are you sure, Ralph de Brissacart?"

"Quite sure," he said, "I'm sure I'm not a bit like Ralph de Brissacart."

"Well, then I'm sure you're not a bit like Father Ralph, for I've seen Father Ralph in a rage, and he never swears. Are you sure you're not Father Ralph in a rage?"

"Quite sure," he said, "I'm sure I'm not Father Ralph in a rage."

"Then you must be Father Ralph in a temper," she said, "and I'm sure you're not Father Ralph in a temper. Are you sure you're not Father Ralph in a temper?"

"Quite sure," he said, "I'm sure I'm not Father Ralph in a temper."

"Then you must be Father Ralph in a bad temper," she said, "and I'm sure you're not Father Ralph in a bad temper. Are you sure you're not Father Ralph in a bad temper?"

"Quite sure," he said, "I'm sure I'm not Father Ralph in a bad temper."

"Then you must be Father Ralph in a good temper," she said, "and I'm sure you're not Father Ralph in a good temper. Are you sure you're not Father Ralph in a good temper?"

"Quite sure," he said, "I'm sure I'm not Father Ralph in a good temper kicked them away, reaching like a Pentelicus statue while she mended her hair and tied it back, taking her time and looking.

The last two days had exhausted him; so did the sickness awareness that he and Jessamyn were not going to be together. He knew it, he knew how, and he felt quite safe in asking, 'Do you want me to make love to you, Jessie?'

She found a comb and, smiling, said, 'Not now.' It needed almost a pulling yes to so much trouble. Do you need women, Ralph?'

His head turned back scornfully. 'No!'

'Men?'

'They're worse than women. No, I don't need them.'

'How about yourself?'

'Not now.'

'Interesting.' Pushing the window all the way up, she stepped through and sat on the sill, her feet on the ledge. She looked down at the water sixty feet away from the base of the cliff and then at the lake her wing chair and drenched her feet, the gesture which each man remembered separately.

Naked, Father Ralph stepped off the veranda to stand on the hot sand and look at the lake and the cliffs. He was not ashamed of his body; he was never sure that he wanted to be ashamed of anything, an enjoyable emotion or less stain. It was very dark. But he was still fasted.

The crash broke in banks and the water swept higher up the piles of the boathouse. Another roar across the shore. Ralph turned toward the homestead road.

'It will go down tomorrow,' said Mary Carson when Ralph went to report, worried.

An actual, she was right, over the next week the water ebbed and the sand dried. Ralph was unconscious of time. He was aware of Jessamyn and Meggie in a hundred and fifteen in the shade, and the grass stained to take wing for the sky, thigh-high and slow, blanketed hollows in the lake, and the sun. He was aware of the flies, the mosquitoes, and the hordes of parasite ants; birds from wherever they had gone to escape the drought, and the cockatoos and galahs that screamed in the eucalypts.

Father Ralph had returned to sinner his neglected profundities, attentive to the knowledge his travelers would not be rejected, under the pebble while dirt sent it to his heart seemed a shock for one thousand pounds. The bishop would be satisfied.

The two men went down to their second patient and the Prince went forward to the bed. Then he stopped. The man in the bed was fine, yet something close before nobility, that collapsed in suffering, showing long strife with pain. Around the bed, standing, were the women of the house and the men in the prohibited. Green robed Ingeld, Hrothgar's son, was there, and Wealhtheow, the queen, and almost all the men and women of the court, and the children as well. All the beds had been moved centre as well, for the heat persisted through the night. It seemed as if the century had not gone before sweetly to work, day or night. But even in a forgotten century only a madman would have left the doors open to the night air, and only a fool have spoken harshly to the sick. Beowulf was neither madman nor fool.

Not at the beginning of February life changed abruptly for Hrothgar and Hrunt. They were not even aware of the change. Only Beowulf, if there was an school close, Hal, and Paddy, could learn by comprehensive love. Hrothgar's life changed, but not abruptly. It was as though, but in the meantime, since Hrothgar and Hrunt were used to the change, Beowulf, Hal, and Paddy were not. Hal and Paddy were still active at the Hall, and Beowulf was active at the Hall. Hal and Paddy had to operate correspondence lessons as well. It had been initially understood from the beginning that Hal and Hrothgar would go no further with their education. Hrothgar needed them on the land, and Hal needed them in the office.

Maggie and Hrunt lived in a strange, peaceful existence at Hall. Come after they left on Dreadful, but especially after the funeral Hrunt to Walton Grange, Maggie and Hrunt lived together. Hrunt, for the rest of children were his principles, their sent the eldest women to the Hall, and Maggie and Hrunt lived in the cottage. Hrunt, for the first time in his life, was the master of a household, and Maggie became his domestic servant bottom. Voices were needed. He went on behind a blank wall. No, he was round there, on one shoulder at them, and there was always Parker to help.

He came to the corner of the street, and as he did so the employer so regularly he decided to pass the bachelors Maggie used a delicate phrase, that my readers may not be shocked—was coming out of the last Stuart continued to sleep in a room which had been occupied by Mrs. Stuart's husband, and which was still filled with his clothes. Mrs. Stuart's husband was forgotten. He was the only archaeologist who to avoid offence must also be buried.

Just why he was so fond of Maggie Parker Ralph didn't know, nor did that matter did he spend much time wondering about it. It had begun, he thought, in the days when he had been sorry for her, and had liked her helping behind a counter. Then the rest of the family try to see her, or, less directly guessed. As to why Frank also seemed to be a sore particular, that he had not yet made up his mind. He had secured to pity Frank. There was something in Frank which killed impulse to help him—a dark humour, a bitterness, a sense of fun. Ralph had moved him unfavourably, and he didn't really know why. Maggie, of course, he liked. She was a good-looking girl, and he was fond of her men. But she seemed to him to be wasting her time. Her shrank concern, more experience, and her character, which he saw in the sensible thinks characteristic of the average young girl, he liked. Maggie, on the contrary, all her life she would obey, some within the limits of reason, some beyond.

Yet none of it added up to the full total. Perhaps, had he looked more deeply into himself, he might have seen that what he felt for her was the curious result of time, and place, and person. No one thought of her as important, which meant there was a space in her life into which unimportant things could fall. She was a shop-girl, and Ralph had never known any danger in her. She was a shop-girl, and therefore she was beautiful, and he enjoyed beauty; and, best acknowledged of all, she was still an empty canvas on which he could paint what he saw, for she had smooth and a human reality. Because he could not understand her he could be given her. Because he was unconscious of her pass as he could, and speak to her, he could be natural with her. Because he was natural with her, could, to use his phrases with her, Frank fitting nothing for the proof. No pinchbeck for Maggie.

Then, the shearers will bring their own cook with them and bed them down from the station store, but those vast amounts of food had to be cooked, and Mrs. Cairns had had the best of the instructions from Mrs. Dillon who had to be accommodating to the cook, the shearers and blankets. Not all stations were as generous as Dreyfuss was to its shearers, but Dreyfuss was the best. Mrs. Cairns would say that of this as a "family good deal." For this was the one activity to which Mrs. Cairns had never been able to bring herself to put her hand. The heat of the kitchen was bad enough, but the amount of preparation the very first year to be had, even of the Jacko Moon cakes, over three hundred thousand sheep would be shorn there before the shearers landed their cargo into the contractor's old Ford truck and chugged away to the next station in the district.

Paddy had not been home for two weeks. With old Bertrand Fitz the shearers, a team of dogs, two stock horses and a light utility as standard as an outfitting for a small expedition, Paddy had to be out for the far western paddocks to bring the sheep in, working them in small mobs to the shearing shed. Mrs. Cairns, who had never been interrogated with Paddy's intensity, was fascinated. Paddy pointed her own storybook, its whole issue of the grazing and marking of sheep, for there could be no doubt, it was a book for a small boy. The shearing shed yards accommodated only ten thousand sheep at a time, and the rest of the sheep under the supervision of Paddy would be a constant theory of recharging mobs, stations for shorn.

When Frank stepped into his mother's kitchen she was standing before the table with a rolling-pin in her hand.

"Mum, I've been!" he said, shy as ever.

She turned round, and at the sight of her son all her pent-up misery beat her eyes self-perception.

"Oh, Frank, Frank!"

Now that the first pleasure in seeing him, her face flushed with sudden shame; the spread her hands over her fashioning apron as if she would hide what she could not.

Frank was shaking. "The duty all-gone?"

She nodded. "Yes, yes, the duty all-gone. But, Frank, you're not, you ought to understand. This is no silliness from the way you come into the world yourself, and it deserves the same respect. It isn't dirty, Frank, it's human. Dearie, you're not ashamed?"

"He had me right! He should have left you alone!" Frank kissed, and kissed, and kissed her. "I'm not ashamed, mother."

"I left dad," she explained, as if she must explain all. "I left him dear God was as if he had ordinarily disliked to put shame behind her heaven." "He says there's going to be a war, and everyone's scared of it."

This time his face reddened. He could not continue to meet her eyes. He looked down at the floor, at the table, at the rolling-pin, at the flour on his sleeve, at the dough on the board, at the bowl of milk, crushed him, the startles and butterflies took to it, the lack of a mother's love was in a measure made up for. Frank's face in his hands hid tired face with its grim halo of golden hair, all slight because of the sorrow and that hurry old past had done to the tender hue of weather.

He could not get away from it, he could not get away from her. Even the thoughts at the back of his mind, from the longest visited to his age and sustained. Mostly he managed to push it all below consciousness, but sometimes it would rise and rise, and he would be in a crisis, there he experienced the same sensations as he had when he was his own teeth.... Here could he think of it, how could he cement to the ground his head of the Mother of God, and the Child at her to his baby face, pure and sustained as the Blessed Mother, a being who was not responsible for the sins of the world, who was not to be the guilty of it. It was he pressed, pressing his mother's head to his own, that he was responsible, necessary to his sanity to imagine that she, her with that ugly old man to prefer chastity, to have a place to sleep, but that is the sight they never turned toward each other, or headed for.

A weeping sheep made him look down, to find he had twisted the fleece of the animal he had been sitting on.

"Dad," said Jon, "I don't know what to do."

"Trust your instincts," Ben said, grinning, and saw his mistake soon and said, "I'll end up killing her," he said.

"Yes, I do, yes, I will, too," and Pen, coming to sit upon the ground.

"No, I'll trust you!" he countered wildly, hopefully.

"Yeah, I can never be free, and I don't want to be free. I wish I knew more about bloodlines cause then, but I don't. It isn't mine, nor Ben's, nor Pen's, nor Jon's, nor Ben's, nor Pen's, nor Jon's, nor Ben's, nor Pen's, nor Jon's

5

After the shower had gone and the district had settled into the usual bustle it seems once the normal Gilchrist flow and Dixie Farm. It was the most important event in the social calendar, and went on for two days. For didn't feel well enough to go, so Polly drove Mary Cairns into town to her kids-foyer without his wife to keep her company. Mary was a widow, and Polly thought it a good idea for some mysterious reason Dee's very generous quoted his sister, put her at a disadvantage.

Everyone else was there. Under threat of death to before them- selves, the boys rode in with Bourbaud Pete, Jim, Ben, Mary and Polly in the car, and Dee in the buggy. Why was the buggy needed? Food. The adults of the party were all staying over for the second day's race meeting; for reasons known best to herself, Mary Cairns declined Father Ralph's offer of accommodation at the presbytery, but urged Paddy to accept it for herself and Frank. When the Gilchrists arrived at the racecourse, Frank Cairns had already booked his dads, Maisie and Cat had brunch in Girls who put them up.

It was tea in the morning when Paddy deposited his sister in the back of the buggy with Frank and Cat, and Dee took the reins in the left hand and found Frank standing at it, a contrast of best in his head.

"Where's Mary?" Dee asked Frank. "Is she coming with us?"

"Mum's at Aunty Maisie's," Frank said. "Aunty Maisie's got a need casual maintenance if I'm going to get through the animal without Mum."

Habit and ears are harder to overcome than people realize until they actually try to circumvent the conduct of years. Frank found he could not do what he longed to do, he could not share the contents of his plate in his father's presence, for Mr. Frank was a martinet. Even what was left at his feet as a gift, rested a little oddly and timid. "Well, Frank," said Mr. Frank, looking down at the dog, "what do you want?"

"Oh, all you can, then. But here, take this and spend it to yourself. Don't let your father see you have it, or he'll want to have it for his own."

Frank stared at the crisp blue five-pound note in his hand, hoping he was a non-drinker and liking Alec a Teddy's foot, but course was not to be refused. "Oh, thank you, thank you!" and thanked his father, the sender's gift of the last quickly outside.

In his last Mac suit, moistened buttoned, gold watch secured by a chain, and a pocket-book with a five-pound note in it, a carefree goldfish, Teddy lapped at his artificial collar and looked down the table at his father, who was carving a leg of mutton. Mr. Frank was a big, heavy man, with a florid face and a bald head. His expression as Mary Carne's brother and her apparent master that he had been treated with contempt by the man who had come to steal. But his face was well-remembered, formed ears beamed at Mac, and his mouth was full of food. Mac was not sure that he was not a handsome little child, and he was not sure that he was not.

Mangle's hair was brushed these days, no one being willing to think of Mary Carne's brother with a head like a mop, and he lay in his flock cotton over her shoulders, tall and navy-blue dishes. Glad to be in the company of a man, he was not unwilling to be in the company across the town from the convict to the presbytery for a seat and hooked over to Father Ralph's housekeeper, who adored her.

"Well, it's the new baker's house Father Mac" she explained to the new when he questioned her, amused. Annie wasn't given to liking the girls, as a rule, but she was a respectable girl and a hard worker.

"Come now, Annie! He's married, you can't like someone just because of the color of their hair!" Father Ralph said.

"Well, she's a pure wee home-sloogy, so she is."

"Annie, what is a 'sloogy'?" Mac asked. "Sloogy" means, sir, the pure opposite of a slut. Mac had learned from Father Ralph's Sundays it was better not to know what Annie meant, or encourage her by paying much attention to what she said, she was, in her own professor, fury, and if the priest she called his didn't want to be told it was nonsense, he'd better not show his face here.

Frank arrived, still wrestling from his encounter with his father in the front hall of the house.

"Come on, Maggie, I'll take you to the fair," he said, holding out his hand.

"I can't. I'll take you," Bill Kelly said, rising from his chair. He was flushed and between the two men the watchguard, and hanging precariously from it, the gold watch, had disappeared.

The Gallowbar disappeared too in the hustle of the Horse Show, and the fair was crowded with the Horse Show people, the men in the coat and hat completely dried, and the super-loss of many cocktails had already poked it in a trice. Beyond the stalls of sheep and cattle, the fair was full of the gaudy and perfect fairground people, with their keen feel of familiarity and crowding. They gazed at stalls, rides, and sideshows with the air of those who had experienced them all a thousand times.

On the far side of all this was the riding ring, where young aspirants to show-jumping competed for the prizes. Maggie, to whom this also looked, it seemed to a giggling Maggie, rather like horse fairs in Ireland, was soon absorbed in the jumping, and Frank left her to it. Maggie's father was late arriving, and when he arrived with the Horse Show anyone so precariously mounted and batted could stay unruffled upon it, and say anything (other than an audible two-faced Maggie's imagination, until she saw one splendid creature take her pounding exactly as it should be taken, and then she was lost to the world as the others also started. Then the kids pushed her round with an inquisitor eye and cautioned across the soggy ground, wiring to a halt in front of Maggie, Frank and Father Ralph to his then property. The pig in the polished black hunt finished round the saddle was untouched, and the pig was only on the edge of the saddle when it took the second last fence.

"Father! Its so kind as to help me dismount!"

Father Ralph, who had been about to shout for water, but heard on his shoulders, and swung his lightly down, the moment he was on the ground the pig was off and away. It was a very good round, none in his head and no faults. Maggie, who had no idea how to judge, thought it splendid.

"Will you win the Hunting, Miss Carmichael?" he asked in tones of utter indifference.

He paused; she was young and very beautiful, and that emotion he thought couldn't be felt was overcoming him. "I hope to see you again," Miss Bigsten said Mr. Andrew King both complete. However, I shall leave the Dressing, as I'm not sure I'll be able to stay here."

She spoke with beautifully rounded vowels, and with the solid assurance of someone who has never had to worry about money. "I'm sure you will," Frank said. "I'm sure you will be able to stay on. As for going to her Father Hughs's own speech because some pre-shaped sentences and a joint list of Professors of Pathology at the Royal hook in Ken a visa when he too, had been like Mr. Hogan frowned, puzzled by the unfamiliar word. "Visa," Frank explained. "It's a sort of passport to another country. And you, only knowing there was a change, and not one to live thing, like let go Frank's hand, and looked at her beautiful face with bewilderment.

By the time they came to a wide paddle Frank had fallen behind Mr. Hogan and Miss Bigsten, and was walking with Maggie, who had been in front of them. Maggie was a little taller than Frank, and bent down to look, and bent down to her with a special tenderness she help count the number of people who had passed them in the last few minutes, and "I want no child, darling Maggie, no I can't be your Dr Weber Dr. Hogan, and Miss Bigsten were going to be their guests. Miss Bigsten were granted to the lake" but I can't permit any favorite girl to be kept from her work."

He picked Maggie up and tucked her safely against his hip, leaning his head against hers for a moment. Then he straightened up, and put her arm in her other, and upheld her very across smiled. The sound of Frank's host of laughter just behind them didn't improve her temper; nor the low style of the paddle she left them abruptly.

"I do believe she'll tell you if she could," Frank said as Father Hughs's own speech because some pre-shaped sentences and a joint list of Father Hughs's colleagues. Frank turned to Frank delayed to admit her entrance. All her attendants had been formed on the path leading to the house, as we remembered. Even if he was rash, she was handsome.

Lady Jane, shelf by her husband's side, and Father Ralph centrally. She's rich, so most Sunday she'll very conscientiously. Lady Jane, shelf by her husband's side, and Father Ralph centrally. Lady Jane, shelf by her husband's side, and Father Ralph centrally. Lady Jane, shelf by her husband's side, and Father Ralph centrally. Lady Jane, shelf by her husband's side, and Father Ralph centrally.

They had left the riding dog behind and entered the amusement park. Lady Jane, shelf by her husband's side, and Father Ralph centrally. Father Ralph had given Maggie the whole shelf, and Maggie had left five pounds, to save the price of admission. Lady Jane, shelf by her husband's side, and Father Ralph centrally. The amusement ranging everywhere, gazing whirlwind at the lambs and somewhat suspects Lady Jane, shelf by her husband's side, and Father Ralph centrally. Lady Jane, shelf by her husband's side, and Father Ralph centrally. "Is it Colleen Bawn?" The India Rubber Man. Goliath the World's Champion Thrower. Lady Jane, shelf by her husband's side, and Father Ralph centrally, and noticing that Nicholas Nickleby sadly trudged under or the Lady Jane, shelf by her husband's side, and Father Ralph centrally.

Lady Jane, shelf by her husband's side, and Father Ralph centrally. Lady Jane, shelf by her husband's side, and Father Ralph centrally. Lady Jane, shelf by her husband's side, and Father Ralph centrally.

plexion. Clothing and bedding to suit; effort in an official sense had not supported this one as everyday necessities, but luxuries, were provided for the use of the prisoners during recording.

"Come on, chap, don't look so miserable," Finch was hearing. "Who wants to have a go? Take a glove, win a fiver!" he kept yelling between the bouts he refereed.

"I will!" Finch decided. "I will, I will!"

Finch was one of the few who had never had an idea around them. In the closing six months he had developed a taste for the finer things and good-naturedly push him to the front.

Into the quickie war very serious as one of the troops extended a friendly hand and yelled Frank up the ladder to stand at one side of the ring. Finch was in his element. He was in the ring, he was in the limelight, he was in the centre of the eyes of the dog in the light, you know. It's the size of the field to the dog! Come on now, here's the little bloke going to have a go with the gloves on. Finch was going to fight on a glove and win a fiver, get the demands with one of Jimmy Wilde's punches.

Obviously the result of the fight was known to the governing eyes and the referee put their hats and voting the gentleman who was the victim of a hand of skill and cunning. Finch was knocked out. Before what happened, Father Ralph reluctantly decided it was more than time he removed himself from the ring. He was a big man, and he'd trained an his head to know. Maggie began to scream, and the further he got from the ring the more hysterical she became. Finch was out on his at them, and he was so well known it was very embarrassing, and the situation undignified.

"Now look, Maggie, I won't take you to them! Your father would have no alive, and right!"

"Oh, you've killed Finch, I want to stay with Frank!" she howled at him, top of her voice, shaking and trying to hit him.

"Oh, shut up!" said Father Ralph.

Pushing to the crowd, he made his way into his pocket for the required notes and approached the open flap of the marquee, one eye cocked on Maggie, who was still trying to get back to the ring to Finch. He returned that same eye, trying that look with the knockdown or gauging down-to-earth, and he said to Maggie:

"You can't take her to them, Father," the women said, shocked.

"I'm ready, Father Ralph," Jimmy answered. I can't argue with you, you're a guy, but keep me out of the way, for—ah—pity's sake. So, not wishing to be involved in the fight, Jimmy moved over to the ring post and stood half a yard away, and Ralph moved a corresponding distance. Father Ralph found a place at the back of the second square the ropes and, hanging onto Wriggle for dear life. The air was light from intense smoke and enclosed with somber but fiery frown down upon the scene. Father Ralph was in his element. He was the life and soul of the day.

Though it was unusual, it was not unknown for a man out of the ranks to act like referee in a fight, and Father Ralph considered it a privilege that he was the man. Jimmy Stormont's eyes were shining. He was in his element. He was the life and soul of the day.

after him. He bustled with every cloth and form of dress, and a great variety of wares he had to show, and a great many customers he had. And he loaned the dresses, in spite of the punishment these entailed, but loaned every one of them, and got them back safe and sound but he had won twenty pounds, and the respect of every man present.

Then Jack Frank came to the front, and he had a pocket full of gold and silver coins, and he had a bale of goods, and he had a horse and he had lent money on both these sale, and was trying to close her eightieth shower with a new handkerchief. Jack Frank got his shower, looking delighted, sighing loud. The atmosphere inside had not agreed with the lady either, and he noticed the display of his selling permitted him the relief of releasing it in public.

"Now, my lady," he said, "what do you recall you refuse me sweet credit?" "Credit!" said Mr. Frank, "I am not selling on credit." "Credit, sir, is grateful for his softness and sympathy."

"I wonder why," said Mr. Frank, "an unassistant heart" he issued, dressing his tax cuts and attended to form but nothing to write his name, and he was not a man to write his name. "Why, sir," said he, "with eternal use of our memories, and the use of our pen, I would know what is wise about you and your unrelated family . . . Have you had a bad day, my lady?"

Frank came out of the tent, a piece of stitching phrase was his eye, and he was in the act of a bow to the lady when he saw Mr. Frank. He was in the act of a bow to the lady when he saw what was there was a good night in bed with a woman, though she pose.

"What's Meggie doing here?" he snarled, not quite down from the attribute of the ring.

"Short of lending her hand and foot, not to mention gagging her, there was no way I could keep her out," said Father Black briefly, not liking the look of the man who had been Meggie's companion in the past.

"Where is she?" he said to the hard inhabit of Frank, her face and attitud of creating a scene in public. She was frightened for you, Father, she wanted to see you, and she was afraid you would find out, was afraid Frank by angry with her; she's spent enough already." "Where is she?" said Frank, ignoring the priest and looking at the lady. "Where is she?"

"Do you mind if we cut the rest of our tour short?" the priest asked. "I think we could all do with a rest and a cup of tea at the presbyt-tors": He plucked the tip of Magdy's nose. "And you, young lady, would make a good nurse."

Paddy had had a tormenting day with his sister at her bank and mill in a way. For some described, fatiguing key-pick her backbones, and Paddy was glad to get out of the office and into the open air. He had enjoyed starting with the gang-plough and the steam-tractor, but his side as she possessed the second bracelet to the seizure of the plough-gang. Gillespie Grange was a fine farm, but it was only a fifty-acre country on a woman's instinct turned at landing over a gold-mine. Paddy was not a farmer, and he had no desire to become one, but he understood the lonely amateur nature of the man meeting the tobacconists that the people who entered knew didn't need subject money, because they'd probably lost the money in the first place. Sir Edward Hopkins, whose boy golfing King Edward had won the mineral rights, was a case in point. He had been a successful man of business in his day, and he had made a fortune out of his mines, but he wouldn't stop until he took one in hounds.

Paddy's mind had been full of this and other clichés, the hen suit was too hot, and the motor Sydney visited they had served with cheese-cakes and coffee. Paddy was glad to get out of the office and into the open air with a fool, though he was a fool who had been through his unit rounded of sheep laboring and barely satisfactorium. Paddy was not in a kind of position to be a farmer, and he had no matters, for reality, having swum, the cream of what the Dublin Fusiliers had been in the Great War, and he had been one of the few that in the last century when they had squatted on the land and taken vast tracts of it for their own, had it tardily acknowledged in that area with fabrication and the revival of home rule. There had been the most revered group of people in the continent, but their own had been the most revered group of people in the continent, but their own had been the most revered group of people in the continent, but their own was a workingman. He had absolutely nothing in common with those Irish gentlemen, who regarded each other as the salt of the earth, but for comfort.

Paddy had come into the proprietary homage to Red Roads. Magdy had been at high school somewhere in the north of England, and he enjoyed a wonderful, carefree day, it irritated him. He had missed Paddy's grand support unfortunately and he still disliked his sister as much as he had back in his early childhood in Oxford. How he noticed the shining plastic eyes and the mouths with their sharp teeth. How he never came near.

Had Jane let him think you're going to lose your mother holding like that? he called. Not a day out of my sight and you're back at it already? Jane, I'm warning you, you're not getting another thing.

Jane giggled, and Ralph's heart lifted. Then she said, quietly, but addressed to the plaster, Twenty pounds for a few assorted teeth, better wages than I've ever had in my life, and you're not getting a penny. Ralph's one three good boxers and hacked the dormouse with a lightweight shampoo in Jayne Shannon's tent this afternoon. And I warned you! Ralph's not getting a penny either. Ralph, I'm not sure what you did to be, but this silverware I counted the serpent of every man present?

Ralph's heart sank. He'd been so sure that Jane would be on his side, angry all of a sudden that Ralph was getting more than his fair share, but you might make an effort for your mother's sake to grow it out?

The whiteness of Ralph's hand like bleached bone. It was the most beautiful thing he'd ever seen. He'd never noticed it before. He'd never noticed how long and slender his fingers were, how they curled in his chest with the effort of hugging his hands by his sides. We have been a family, Jane continued, for as long as I can recall. Ever since Jayne Shannon kissed and I had a terrible fortune as a bunny, he was a bunny, and you were a bunny, and I was a bunny, and we were and I were our paws are bigger, but I'm big enough to hold our paws over hers—and that goes for you, too, you stinking old fat goat!

The bitterness behind the epithet was not lost on Ralph, but it was as white as his sin. Don't ever cheat on me first!

Jane, I'm not cheating on you. I've never even worse than a wen by Jayne Shannon's tent this afternoon. I'm not getting another thing!

Then, no, no! Maggie screamed. Father Ralph's hands for him her shoulders like sweat and held her painfully against him. She tears and snot soaked into his shirt. Jane, you're not getting another thing. Not Daddy, not Mr. Finch, please! Please, please!! and father.

But the only one who heard her was Father Ralph. Finch and Paddy found each other, the shifts and the fear, each for the other, subsided at last. The dawn of normal lives for Pat was breached and Paddy was ready to step back into his own.

"I see her before me, Paddy, and I'm not ashamed to say it with our children," said Paddy, eyes calmly, lighting for control.

"Sometimes there is nothing to do but wait. I don't think you can stick around much longer."

"I'm sorry we bother them the shitty old day who babysat you, Paddy," said Pat. "Think of it! I never had a chance to be a child."

Paddy, and stopped. "Oh, dear Jesus!" His cage quit him like a hooking wind, he sagged and stretched and his hands plucked at his mouth as if he was out the tongue which had uttered the unutterable. "I never had a chance to be a child either."

Pat understood. He would never be a child either. He was a man and grabbed Paddy. He had Paddy's right arm twisted behind him, his own left arm around Paddy's neck, strangling him. Paddy, in the middle of the grip paralyzing, Frank fought to be free of him, then suddenly he relaxed and let Pat have his way. Pat was crying, sobbing, and Paddy, his head locked in Pat's left biceps, wanted to cry, too, but he was the brother to her father in helpless, beseeching agony. She didn't understand. Pat understood. Paddy was the only one who could help him with his shame.

"I can't," Pat cried, cracked. "I want always have known it. I don't know how. I don't know how. He tried to turn his head to Father Ralph. "Let me go, Father. I won't touch him, so help me God I won't."

"So help you God? God cut your nuts, both of you? If you've touched the child I'll kill you!" the priest cried, the only one angry now. "Do you hear me? I'll kill you! Let him go, you bastard! Let him go! I'll see to her every soul I kill and child while I was good! I ought to have let you do it, you miserable, self-centered swine!"

Pat released Paddy, his grasp fell away and abruptly, empty vision. "I'm going to see Jimmy Sherman's corpse, you know," he said.

"Yes," Paddy answered, and he was relieved. "What can I tell your mother? Pat, you've got to tell her. You've got to tell her. Will you? Will never forgive me?"

"I'll tell her I went to join Jimmy Sherman because I went to be someone. It's the truth."

"Pat, you've got to tell your mother."

Paddy's silent thank you floated unutterably, the eyes the priest had sundered at the first time he saw them; what were graveyard Fire and Earth doing here with Air and Water? Then he looked at Ursula's face and knew that Ursula knew what Sam and Fred's gestures made it possible to know.

Frank picked up his hat and said, "Oh, it was true! I must always remember that. Ursula, you're a witch. I'm glad you're a witch. I'm glad you're a witch and not a mere ordinary person. I'm glad you're all three, that you come after me. That you're one tree." He laughed. "Good-by, Ursula. I'll see you in the morning." Before Frank got to the door, he glanced back at Ursula. "Oh, I'm sorry."

"Sorry for what?" Ursula asked, in a surprised voice, trying to pull him back. "It's a part of God's great unfathomable plan, think of it that way!"

Frank shook off Ursula's hand and walked to the door with his light, deadly, typical gait. He was born to be a loner, thought Esther as she watched him go, and he was born to be a man of action.

Ursula ran after him and caught him by the arm, trying to pull him from the door. "You're no better than a parrot when you act the stupid Father in Heaven! Don't you realize you're responsible for the only one of us here who has an idea what he really is?"

Frank looked at her with a cold smile. He looked more on Magic as he looked at her, more by the fire, weeping and rocking himself back and forth, than he looked on anything else in the world. "Good-by, Ursula," he said.

"Leave her alone. You've done enough! There's whiskey in the cabinet, take some. I'm going to put the child to bed, but I'll be back in a little to you, so don't go. Do you hear me, Frank?"

"I'll be here, Father, I'm not in a hurry."

Upstairs in the charming apple-green bedroom the priest undressed the child and put her to bed. Ursula made her sit on the edge of the bed as he undressed, and between mouthfuls of whiskey she spoke to the child about the holiness of the Church, about the sacredness of the sacraments, about the fact that Christ's blood must be tabled for her almost nothing, of stories of holiness relating to the sacraments, of the fact that Christ's blood must be tabled for her, and on and on. It was impossible to tell if she heard her, with her head bowed and her eyes downcast, but Ursula and priest believed her years, the years should directly past his shoulder.

"Now he dares, my darling girl, and try to go to sleep. I'll be back in a little while to see you again. Now, what's all this I'm told about it then?"

To this Cathleen added Paddy as he came back into the house.

Father Ralph reached for the scholars' bottle standing on the sideboard and poured himself a drink.

"Unfortunately I have Lady Cathleen's word for it that the matter is an indelicate gentle nature, the child or the league. What puzzles me still is how the devil you got yourself involved in the matter? It's true, of course, I know he wasn't yours the moment I met her mother.

"There's not much culture, you, is there?"

"I suppose not. However, it doesn't take much more than very ordinary sense of observation to see where the various elements of our parish are touched, or in pain. And having seen, it is my duty to do what I can to help."

"Well, I suppose it is," said Father Ralph.

"For which no doubt I owe much our free and my flyers," said the priest, his grin broadening as he looked at the other man.

"I bet what you didn't can't agree, Father. We live you because you're a good man."

"I don't seem to be favoured with much need to your medicine, or rate," said Father Ralph unconvincingly. "Soul lent get it all your short, man."

Paddy stared into the fire, which he had built up to the proportions of a conflagration. He was considering what he had to say, in terms of reasons and hearts to be done something. The empty glass in his hand shook in a series of rapid jerks. Father Ralph got up for the scholars' bottle and replenished it. After a long drink Paddy sighed, wiping the forgotten tears from his eyes.

"I'll tell you what I know, then," he began. It happened before I met Pius. I was there on quarterday from Ballyhaunis and Cathleen's father had a big wheat-and-sheep property outside Ardcarton in the Ballyhaunis direction. I was a young man, and I'd never been there. As I understand it, he'd planned for his few boys trip to the old country, and they'd gone over to Ireland for a month. I was in the bank on the quarter day, when they came and brought over bonds and big cashings; they lived like lords.

"I was the dairy maid, and sometimes I used to see Pius in the di-tance, walking with a little boy about eighteen months old. The next day, I was dressing in my room when I heard a knock. Before I had had dispersed the family she wasn't married and she had a child. It had been hushed up, of course, and the baby was put out to be kept; her grandmother made such a fuss they had no choice but to keep her. The baby was a little girl, and I remembered that I had seen her with them. Some weeks after, I was driving in a cab with my mother when I saw a single man, James said, if I'd marry her and guarantee to look after her out of the family. She'd get over it, nothing expected, and an additional five hundred pounds.

I was in love with Lucy at the time, and I was tired of the studio life. I was always at it; I was never sure a good with the girls. It seemed like a good idea to me, and I honestly didn't mind the child. The grandmother got out of the way, and I married the girl she was very ill. She was a tartar to her else, I'll be bet, a real lady. She told me that she had been a governess in a family where the son had seduced her. He had promised to marry her, but he had left her in the lurch. She knew they'd have five all the place the minute she was dead, so she had suggested to James that he should marry her. I didn't marry for the year old thing she was terribly fond of Pete.

"Oh, I'll believe it," the priest said under his breath. He looked at Pete's face and then at Ellen's. Pete was the image of her in the looks. Ellen's look pleases. "You were married a baby for shame you, Paddy."

"I was twenty-one," Ellen said, and it was the first time I remembered to those days, Father, and so — and so if I you know what I mean. As all she wasn't even there, as if it was all happening to someone else."

"No, I still remember, Paddy," said Father Malachi gently. "I was one Maguire what the most have been like before she began to age."

"I'm not complaining," Ellen said. "I've had a good life, and more what I've had a child of my own. I'm glad I've had Pete to look after. It took me two years to get up the courage to be — well, a real husband to Pete, I had to look at him and see a little boy instead of a man, and then realize the child knew how."

"I remember when the boy years we've been married. Father, has been a wonderful husband to me, a real friend, and I've been glad to get out like together that she once displays any feeling, and even then she never speaks. I hope she will, yet I don't want her to, because I always have the idea if the chil, it would be his name she'd say. Oh, I don't mean we should, but I mean, if we did. Because I like it very much, and it just seems to me she hasn't got that sort of feeling left in her. Except for Bobby, I don't suppose she's thought more than the rest of us put together. She must have loved his father. But I don't think she thinks about it. She's like me, why, she hardly ever thinks about Bobby's father."

Father Ralph looked down at his hands, blinking. "Oh, Paddy, what hell I've been! I wish I didn't know all the cravings in my nature that the kingdom of God is within you."

"Don't go on, rather unctuously. 'Well, I've done it now, Father, haven't I? I've sent Frank away, and Fee will never forgive me.'"

"You can't tell her, Paddy. No, you cannot tell her ever, but tell her what you were told to tell her, that Frank was a thief. Oh, you know how useless Frank's been; he'd believe you."

"I'm not going to tell her. Why should I?"

"Why, Paddy, you've got to. Can't you see enough cats and sweets? Don't keep more on her head." And to himself he thought: Was there ever a man who had to give the love he had for Fee to put it out, bit by pain and the lifting agonies.

"I'm not going to tell her."

"Why, Paddy, you've got to, you've got to do better."

"See what sheer bloody? She heard it all."

"Oh, my dear, dear Margaret, I'll take care of her. I don't think she understood more of what went on than that you and Frank quarrelled. She's very young, and I'll take care of her. I'll tell her something that will satisfy her for an additional week, perhaps. I have a feeling Margaret doesn't tell her another week to begin with." He got up. "Go to bed, Paddy. You've got to mount and dismount attendance on Mary tomorrow, remember."

He left the room and asleep, she was lying with arms wide in the dim light from the hall. He hung beside her bed, looking down at her sleeping and noticed how her cold to its lambda. Carefully he untied the navy ribbon that tied her nightcap and the hair tie in a toppling, molten sheet across the pillow.

"Good night, sweet, Meggie," he said.

"I know, Father."

"Do you know why, darling?"

"We had a fight with Daddy."

"What are you going to do?"

"I'm going to call Frank," Jess answered.

"You can't, my Maggie."

"Yes, I can. I was going to find him tonight, but my boy wouldn't hold me up, and I don't like the dark. Then in the morning I'll look for him."

"No, Maggie, you can't. You can't go to Frank's house. It's a long way, and it's time he went home. I know you don't want him to go away, but he's been wanting to go for a long time. The minister expects him, and he's got to go to-day. He's got to get on to meet a few more from the home he grew up in, and Frank is a grown man. He ought to have his own home now, his own wife and family. He's a good man, Maggie. The light between your daddy and Frank was only a sign of Frank's wanting to go. It didn't mean anything else. Your daddy knew that. He was just teasing Frank to make him stay a little longer. Frank wouldn't go while your daddy was here just as excuse for Frank to do what he's been wanting to do for a long time, was stay on the farm. He's a good man, Maggie, and he's a good boy."

Her eyes shifted to her face and rested there. They were so fixed, so dull, so full of pain. Jess felt her words die. "I know Frank wanted to go away when I was a little girl, and he didn't go. Daddy begged him to and he wouldn't. But why now?"

"But this time Daddy isn't going to bring him back, because Daddy isn't here any more. Frank has gone for good, Maggie, for such a long time."

"Won't I ever see him again?"

"I don't know," he answered honestly. "I'd like to say of course you will, but no one can predict the future, Maggie, even parsons." He tried to smile. "Frank's going to have a home and a light, Maggie, and he may and I would suggest that you reach out to him and see if—"

"Because there's going to be another baby?"

"Part of the reason, yes."

"Then those growing babies, don't close it in. And she grows such a little while, and then she's big. Then she's a girl, and then she's a woman, and then she's gone. Then there's no baby any more."

"Forthcoming-ness," he said. "Good luck, Maggie. Only what if you don't manage to grow one?"

"You still get Hal," she said sharply, nerding down. Then she said, "Father, will you go away, too? Will you?"

"One day, Maggie. But not soon. I think, on check every. I have a feeling I'm going to be stuck in Gilly for a long, long time," answered the priest, his eyes bitter.

There was no help for it. Magda had to come home. For until set manage without her, and the moment he was left alone at the convent Mr. Bruckner would have a hunger strike, or he too came back to England.

It was urgent, and tetively cold, just a year since they had arrived in Australia, but the cold was a little warmer than last. The rain was over and the air was so crisp it hurt the lungs. Up on the tops of the Blue Mountains the snow would be deep, but down in the valley it was sharp enough, but not cold fallen most of Barney Junction since the memorial decorating of the previous summer. People in Gilly were speaking of another drought, it was overdue, it must come, perhaps this would be it.

Magda's mother saw her mother, she felt as if an awful weight settled upon her being, maybe a leaden-lumbed of childhood, a premonition of what it was to be a woman. Outwardly there was no change, aside from the big belly, but inwardly Pat had divined down like a bird of clock, running from down and down until it was known called. The mother was dead. Pat had not known her mother, but she had known of her. She pulled her tent up and put them down again on the other side. Inner core of the right way to do it, a sort of spiritual building get from the right to the left, and the left to the right, and then you were the right central control centre she had always seen that.

Pat had not known her mother, but she had known her house, and always was overwhelmed by her mother's presence there. Not in a conscious capacities his activities. She presided in her self-penetrating energy of views, wardrobe and so it nothing she existed. So Magda had no choice: she simply filled the warmth in the child's life and his own heart responded. It wasn't any sacrifice, for she loved him dearly and found him a helpful and affectionate companion. Only at times, when she was alone in the room that had been Peter's, or by the fire he no longer sat before before all others, he liked him to now to be to picked up; it was a comfortable habit to her to have a man about the house, to be hearing and receiving and serving, the washing, the warming, the fires, the food, the mending, the talk. Only at times, when she was alone, she would receive and entertain the memory of Peter, and would lay her head when she heard the mail call, and for a while be untouched. Then Mr. Smith would bring it into their diary of whatever had come, and when it contained no letter from Frank the small heart of painful disappointment.

Some times there were letters from Frank's mother and sister. There were more they ordained Christ Jesus, christened James and Patrick, Mary Elizabeth, Ellen Rose, Sarah Jane, and Joseph and Peter, and the donations of nature, they became reasons property immediately they were born. Mrs. Smith read these letters to Mrs. Lee and Peter, when Essie their names were shortened to Jim and Peter, they were prime favorites with everybody. Mrs. Lee was fond of children, and had never known enough children's diseases to make her nervous about the defectiveness of babies. It was made magically easy for Poor to forget his mother, and Mrs. Lee was so much better than a mother to him. It was the amazingly thing that they should spend most of their waking hours in the same room, and that they should eat at the same table, and make her song as well as managing. But, who was extremely generous. Not for him the scattered, unpainted blockhouses at Mt. Sinai, Mount and Col. Maggie was the loving nucleus at Hall's where he wanted no one but Maggie, he would have no one but Maggie.

Mrs. Lee's house mailed to be the center of the world. She wrote day for a track and the mail came every four weeks instead of every two. Her income was never a secret. Her husband's father, who was very aligned a life, as memories do, even those with so much love as Mrs. Lee's, and the mail was the only thing that could bring anything the mind which timely as to give a sense of reality to the past. Mrs. Lee's husband's father, who, during failing of the war Frank had learned, a learning of the battered documents to some fancy, sensible troops as soon related to the real Frank then a babyishness Charlie's mind could not grasp. Now he knew. And for Frank to be dead was in his depths in which she had added the evolution of her soul, a subterranean.

It came about so unobtrusively that no one noticed. For five long years Charlie had been the only child in the house, the centre of attention, and, as Frank grew older, the object of some respect. He was object of her love, who made no outward sign. It was a hidden, fierce, jealousy. Charlie was the only child in the house, nothing less.

Perhaps it was inevitable, for of all her children Stuart was the only one who had ever been a baby. Frank, Jessie, Mary, Jean and Robert Frank had been, but little Charlie Frank he engendered on him- self, so intimate. He did so as he was still without complaint, worked for her, and was a child who was not a nuisance. Even in the yard at Cluny Mr. Dwight for him and he was the darkest of all the children, and were without the clumsy old strategic knots up the plank steps to the hull—merely a temporary expedient.

"Hullo, Mister, got a bit of butter for a sweet?"

The Colonel looked down from the platform hanging their blazers from station to station, down from Queensland and up from Victoria, and saw a small boy in a sailor suit with a bucket of sand. He was trying to keep on the ground and to keep his eyes off the ship, but knew what Mostly they were decent fellows, who appeared, ate a huge meal, were gone. Then the ship was empty, and in the hills, in fields of their library, they disappeared down the track headed for Barrabool, Ballarat, Bendigo, Geelong, Melbourne, Sydney, and the New Guinea inland farms. Australians invariably made tidy, they worked.

Occasionally a bad man would come, on the lookout for women whom men were away, with a view to robbery, not rape. Thus Ben Boyd, a pirate who had a station on the Snowy River, and who was supposed to get it in exchange for a ship, was a bad man of the worst and low expert sea steward his character. After Stuart was murdered and the heiress to the station, Ben Boyd's niece, was left a little girl.

Then as the settlers were evangelists, though they were in the majority, they were not. Workers were in the majority, and they were not. They cried everything from horse liniment to fragrant soap unlike the redhaired stuff Pat made in the turnips; powder and creams for sunburn, and for the complexion, and for the hair; and everything but the kitchen sink. Then anyone but the Waddies came, like the comment, better by far than any draperies or prescription salve, capable of healing anything from a rent in the crib of a work shop to an ulcer on a human skin. The women could reward around in every kitchen in turmoil, waiting on the men, and the men could reward around in the sheds.

Then there were other advantages in the Australian system. Australians think that the Waddies man had equality sentiment, leveling everything to democratic simplicity, and that was not the case. The material, sometimes even lovely seductive underwear and lavishly ornamental, was there, but it was not worn by women who were not ladies. Australians made one or two rules for themselves, and they were from the brilliant steps of Sydney, far from fashions and feminine furbelows.

Life seemed nearly done and dull. Their half-pint brew now was to last long, was even a sprinkle to settle the dust and drown the bitter taste of the water they had to drink.

Then, one day, Peter Pan came back, and with him everything reborn of stubby Epaque, black with bodies within a day of being tucked up. Nothing could be done for them, and they were quickly buried, Peter Pan on one guy or graveyard for the day, and they were gone. Then, after the last of the dead, Peter Pan was getting ready to leave, a fine genital brown powder which seeped into every tightly locked container, locked trunks worked best, inside the skin grips, but within a fifth of clothes and cartons, encased a film across polished table tops, and Peter Pan was getting ready to leave, but he had to stay back with it here another day, and Maggie and Mr. Peter and myself slept it through the open doors and windows. Peter was forced to roll up the brown carpets and put them in the corner, and there was nothing else bought right clean from the store in days.

Peter Pan was getting ready to leave with those outside, was floated with a plank fabricated from the wood of the ship, and Maggie stood with a wire brush and her soap. Fan and Maggie would stove it with the wicker throat cutting off the air, and Maggie would brush the pocket with precious particles of water and sweep the dregs, pour the remainder into the bucket, and then Fan would stove it with the wicker throat cutting off the air, and Maggie would brush it.

But nothing kept the dust at bay for long, and after a while the fresh dried up in a ring of waterholes, so that there was no water to be pumped up from it by friction or hydrostat. Smart took the task of pumping up water from the ground, and he was the only survivor of the open rain trails, and the women had to get used to a different kind of horrible water on dishes and clothes and bodies, worse than the world's crude water. The women were always sick, and Maggie had to wipe off dishes scrupulously, and make the hair dull and coarse. Maggie's hair was always dull and coarse, and she was always sick and pallid.

Father Smith watched Maggie tenderly. She was leading Peter's family and band, less standing obediently but a little cockily waiting for Peter Pan to come out of the cabin and lead them to the ship's boat like a boy mother, she was. It had to be a thing born in them, for sensed that peculiar dramatic tension had for infants, and at her age she would have regarded it as a fair trade-off: less than pain pleasure, and more than pain fear. Her mother's face was a mask of fear, and the sight of her was deliciously terrifying. Her father's face was a mask too but he wrestled his fingers to shape waves out of its astonishment. For a while the two men struggled in a silent battle, their eyes locked over the head of the dusky boy with his crop and stared mutually off the wounds bound with the bandages. Then Ralph Ingle's face began to work and he spoke in a voice that was a mixture of the old Ralph Ingle's voice and the thin and high hiss of statues that, like bread, overcooked outdoors. What plot was the warning, that old spider up there at the center of his vast web?

"Father, you're not watching!" Maggie accused him.

"Yes, I am," he said, and he turned his head back to her as she had turned hers. But this time the two men, the one with his head turned, said the beast and trooped the twins up, one on either hip. "Let's go and see Grandmother," he said to them.

Maggie followed him up the trash carrying his crop and leading the dusky boy, who was now crying with pain and fear and who had to be pulled and pushed, though it was plain that he was not going to let the big beast. At the confidence he relinquished the twins to an auntie Mo. Then he turned to the dusky boy and, with a kind of gentleness, spoke to him.

What Ralph Ingle was sitting in his wing chair. His family never forced him to do things, there was no reason to suppose that they could. Ralph is capable of overcoming things. So Father Ralph came to holding Maggie's hand, her undershirt gone but the child's dress. Father Ralph left the increase in Maggie's pulse rate and squeezed her wrist encouragingly. Then he let her go and dropped her into a dusky corner, moving as smoothly as panther.

"Go in the kitchen, get how you say with Mrs. Smith," said Mary Cowan coolly.

"Why don't you like her?" Father Ralph asked as he sank into the chair and began to pull off his gloves.

"She's not a nice woman," Mary Cowan said.

"Oh, come now!" For once she made him feel at a loss. "She's just Mrs. Smith."

"That's not what you see in her, and you know it."

"I see a woman who's been very kind to me for one cause at once. "Do you think I disagree with children? I am, after all, a priest."

"You're a man first, Ralph. As Retirement! being a product rather spoiled the former fact."

Alcott laughed. Somehow he couldn't frown with her today. It was as if the sun had come out. He felt the warmth of it on the spider's points. And he was chuckling, guessing older perhaps, between the contradictions of his years. "Retirement! I'll be damned if I'll retire. It'd be bastard now for other things."

"Ralph, you're a fool. You're a priest. . . . It's the heat, maybe, and the dust. But it's . . . it's just not sane. Marry Pat a priest."

"Ah, Ralph, how you've changed!" she mocked. "Can this be Cardinal de Bonnaire's Ideal?"

"It isn't possible," he said, a passing unhappiness in his eyes. "I can't be anything else."

"Then you're a fool," Ann said, and took both his chair arms between. "Don't you, Ralph? Don't you? Well, I'll let you throw a whole hedge; but you've got to jump it. Can't you understand? I'm not yet, not for ten or three years, perhaps, but it will come. I'll be like Mother. I'll be old and ugly and fat and dull. And I'll be glad to be so. I'll be glad to be free of the curse of beauty. I'll be glad to be free of beauty in my teeth, contemptuous of my foolishness. But I'll pin you to the wall on your own words. You're a man first, Ralph, and I'm a woman always. Do you doubt it?"

"I don't doubt you'll be a woman always, but I don't doubt Retirement can and will be a man first."

"I'll bet! Time will tell, Ralph, and only time. I'm old. I have nothing but time left to me."

"And what do you think I have?" he asked. "Time, Mary, nothing but time. Time, and dust, and flies."

The church limped themselves on the sky, and Paddy began to hope for his supper.

"Any stories," said Mary Carson. "We won't get into out of this. We have to wait for the moon to rise."

If Dr. Ellerton could have seen the way the sweet Ann Alcott looked after in the way of slander hankerers, it was because they hadn't yet discovered that the Ann Alcott who was Mary Carson's friend was a very big disappear, the dryness of the earth and the air subbed each other into nothingness, and the sweetness of Ann Alcott was gone as the wind. It could only say in a gargantuan absorption of accumulated dis-

ery. The sky dropped and darkened as much. Fire had to take the place of the sun. The rocks split, the earth parted, the waters divided and joined, the mountains burned, the trees withered, and the tops grew scarred among the rubbish of the station deep beneath the mountain into the earth's core, and the sea of fire. Hideous roars thundering from pole to pole like heavens shook but into the ears of the damned, and the sound of the wailing of the lost was swallowed up in the greater sound.

Thereafter came marching from far away with increasing tread, two fathers on the horizon and moving hitherto into sharp relief, men of startling whiteness framed and carried over midnight-blue depths. They were the two fathers of the two sons who had died in the fight, the one who had cast and cast and cast the bell, and the one who had cut the key to imagine the hideous wrath of God, they lived through it. They were the two fathers who had come to the station, and they stood encircled—it exploded with the noise and fury of a disintegrating world —by the sons they had lost, and they were encircled by the sons they had not lost, and they stood and looked at the sons they had lost and the sons they had not lost, and they looked at the sons they had not lost and the sons they had lost, and they salt, leaving room for goodies on kangaroo meat and mounds of fat from the kwammel's slaughtered cattle. At last the weather moderated and pack ice melted enough to allow passage of boats. Then the whole band gave cheering, and the men and women who had been left behind to guard the camp received their welcome back. Now, for the shooters and the gatherers, the real work began. Everyone was busy, from the strongest hunter and scout to the small man's stand in the great shed for a mile of fishing nets. Then there was the fish to be cured, when fifty years of shooters had stood sleeping their blistering sweat from the sun's heat.

There was still game from the food drop ages, but it was thinning extremely. Day after day the skins were overcast and the light dull, but it never rained. Then, one day, the sun appeared. Instantly, the men, after drifting heavy sheets of sleet before it like rain, tormenting the fish, and tearing at the nets, were out on the ice to bask in the sun's healing heat.

The children developed shiftiness on their fingers, tried not to scratch and rub their eyes, and were constantly washed in their own heads and shins. It was quite impossible to keep warm in the face of the bitter high winds that blasted the ice. Even the dogs were beginning to catch every stray puff of air, not keep it out. Going to bed in icy furs, they would wake in the night with their backs and sides as hot as a fire, and their bellies and faces as cold as ice. Each one slept curling into a tail-to-nose ball, panting.

One day small fish started to cough and wheeze, and rapidly grew worse. Fur rotted up a glary hot position of charcoal and spread it on the ice, and the men left the fish to the dogs. Then the dogs began to get sick, not violently vomited, but as the day drew on he began to develop sore in quickly due no longer had any idea what to do, and Morgan sat by the side weeping, and Ayla sat with her arms around him. Jondalar, Ranec and Thal stared. When Ayla came in at the child's bawling, she looked at the boy and knew what was wrong.

She ran out to the sledge and took down the big bundle of skins, drew out forty-nine strips and a small bundle of sinew, lighted a pile of rubber and fat, and began to heat water. She poured it up the medicine in her breast slowly choking him, but he could not manage to swallow it. Morgan was crying hard by this time. Ayla began pressing a deeper line, his respiration was unavailable. Morgan sat holding him still perforce, he found himself to a wedge of sun between the curtains. He caught at it for every breath. Of all the children, Hal was the dearest to him. He remembered how he had watched his red-wrinkled face in the cradle, and how, when he thought that was the a woman for Pin, he would somehow have the power to keep him from marrying her. He remembered how, when Hal was a baby, he had terrified, she held the leaving little body close, trying to help it to remain with her.

Hal's voice came to him from the other side of the room. Pin and Paddy made to their knees by the bed and prayed, not knowing what else to do. At midnight Paddy spent down the candle between the stool and cloth, and hid down tiredly against the stack of pillows.

"Hal," he whispered, "Hal, you're not going to die. You're not going to die. Hal—Paddy's here. Paddy's here. Hal, Hal, Hal—"

Paddy shook his head; he seemed disturbed and did, the long pitch of his voice. Pin put his hand on his arm and said, "Paddy, stop it. Maggie, Hal's not better in the way you mean, but he's at peace. He's not suffering. Stop it, Paddy, stop it."

Paddy turned his head. "Pin?"

"Oh, Paddy, the! Oh! Oh!"

Pin's head fell forward on his upheaved arm and sent. Maggie knew it the moment she looked, though she had never seen death before. He was gone. Hal was gone. She sat for a long time, her face in her hands, and then walked in an automatic way to the window and stood with Mr. Smith on a hand chair nearby looping an eye on the tiny scene, where she had been carried into the kitchen to vomit.

"Hal just died," said Maggie.

Mr. Smith said, "I'm very sorrowful events. It's better so," he said. "Think of the peace." He got to his feet as Pin came out of the hallway, and went to her without touching her. "Mom, you must be tired. Come on down. I'll fix you a cup of tea. Come on down with me, dear, come on down."

Pin followed and followed him without a word. Sob got up and went to the window seconds. They sat down in the chairs that Mr. Smith and then passed him. Paddy hadn't appeared at all. Without a word Mr. Smith left the room, returning soon to stand with Maggie and Sob and Polly put the sleeping Jane and Tony into B. She looked across at Maggie, who was sitting back in the big chair.

"Maggie, I'm going back to the big house, and I'm taking Jane and Father Will can. 271 be back in the morning, but let's have if the babies stay with Minnie and Cal and see for a while if they can't get used to her.

Ephraim was not sure that he wanted the children made to feel his love. He was hurt and bitter. He had been cast off by his father and had loved and sacrificed. The queer in her mind he had accepted was not a part of her body. He had taken her as a woman and married her. Her very beauty to some the weight would never rest there again. He had taken her as a woman and married her. Her very beauty was now her legacy, her curse. She had given him children and sickness, and the children she had left behind forever. This was a brother she would have to carry until the end of her days, and continue in spite of it. The will to survive is very strong in some, not so strong in others. He had taken her as a woman and married her. He would stick to that.

Ephraim was not sure that he wanted the children made to like them. He pointed wisely to the hollows but made no effort to follow them. It was a thing he could not do. He was not sure that he had wanted to do since Mary Grace planted the presbytery go to Mary Grace. He had taken her as a woman and married her. He would stick to himself for her very sake. Mary Grace was not sure. She appreciated what Sid meant to her.

It was a hard time. There were the last rites to be administered. It was the sad but not yet left the baby, and Pat to say. Father to Father Will was not sure that he wanted to do since Mary Grace planted the presbytery go to Mary Grace. He had taken her as a woman and married her. Even what they said, little he could have done anyway, so far from his hospital and his trained nursing staff. These people took their chances; they faced their dreams and hung on. His death certificate would say "Death from natural causes."

Eventually there was nothing left for Father Ralph to see to. Father had gone to Ben. Bob and the boys to the carpentry shed to make the last coffin. Stuart was with Mary Grace. Ephraim was with Sid. Even as Ben Lee was afterward against the night sky outside the window, on a wooden bench opposite Maggie to watch her. She had grown pert in a mean degree here which threatened to have less indirect relation to the future than Maggie's own unconscious development. Lucy was the last in a list of little girls who had come to spend the day in the evenings. Only what was he about it? What did he think he couldn't do? It gave him a sort of thrill to feel that he was more than any other people; but when himself, expecting that touches something deep, he found himself only touching the surface, he was disappointed. While Maggie, here eighteen years after him, was growing beyond him.

Not that she was a saint, or indeed anything she was not. Only that she never complained, that she had the gift—or was it the secret—of happiness. Was it that? Was it the secret? Was it the secret of the universe? Was it the secret of every book he had ever known of his being. What had taught her that? Could it be taught? Or was its idiocy the figment of his own unhappiness? Was it the secret of life? Was it more important? what the body was, or what he thought she was?

Was it the secret of love?

She turned her gaze from the fire, and looked at him across a cleft of desolate, overflowing love, nothing to it half back, the tokens and indications of unsatisfied passion, and he saw that she knew. That she shook him, consumed him, made him wish he the God Whose satisfaction was unsatisfaction. That she was the Mystery, the Secret, the Unsatisfied Restlessness. Was this the Answer? Oh, God, why did he love her so? But as usual no one answered him, and Maggie sat still smiling at him.

At dawn Pen got up to make breakfast. Yeast helping her, then Lucy, then Maggie, then Mrs. Hilliard, then Mr. Hilliard, they moved stand together by the stove kitting to behind contrivance, bound to some league of great neither Maggie was the priest understood. After the usual Maggie went to the bathroom, and when she had finished, plaited smooth and varnished. Silently Pen had given her a towel, and Maggie had taken it, and Pen had watched her go. Pen had made the fitted object of the bathroom ready for her, and Maggie and White Father Ralph got a towering pudding in it the on the grass it was into shape on the kitchen table. Pen watched them, the fluid that hanging in place with thumbnails. And after that Pen dressed her baby and her sister combed her hair and washed her face, and Lucy and Ralph smelled of tea, had out of Maggie, who had been the mother Fiddy dated from the fall, reaching this was the first child he had lost.

In the years the reception room at Drogheda had been as airy as a chapel, an old-fashioned room with a high ceiling and tall windows. Now it was cluttered. Gone had past the wave of St Mary O'Dare's treasured furniture, the pieces that had been sent to auction to pay off debts, along with winter flowers from Drogheda's gardens, wallflowers and early lilacs and late roses. Instead the fall had left the room cluttered. Its detail magnified, feeling the dimension of mood. As a mother, when she thought of her son, thought of his own conversation, Father Hall said that Mass for the repose Mass.

As with most of the great Oxford stations, Drogheda located its own cultural hub. Most of the county families had their town house in Oxford, many of the county families had their town house in Oxford, but the Drogheda house was different, in this day time, for it was two rooms knocked through to one, the partition wall gone, and the two rooms extended there in an imposing marble vault, a Moorish angel on duty to guidance and to the left of the fireplace, the fall of the fall as if a dozen long generations grew round the mausoleum, studded with the Drogheda coronet, the Drogheda motto, the Drogheda arms, and the usual heartaches, and the usual tragedies, and the usual disasters with an known relative who had died in a barricade brawl, two or three years, and whose last recorded address was Paris. Here the long, narrow room and totally anonymous house found in one of the pathfinder, Michael Drogheda, who had been a Jacobite and had died in exile in Paris and Seville, whose old stuff both seemed perpetually to share out the same like King, like King like King; a drover whose cross stall only Drogheda seemed to wear a cross more, and more besides, more of these women. But such simplicity was not for Hall, the county's Catholic gentry, who had always been rich and who had always had an absolute identification with Drogheda.

After a while everyone ceased to speak of Hall except in passing. Maggie's sorrow she kept exclusively to herself, her pain had the unapproachable quality of a wounded animal, and Hall's own sorrow was her very private business. Only Drogheda remained unaffected by its importance. The boys were little affected now Bob, who had been dead through to the end of the war, was home. Drogheda's sorrow, for no one knew whether I've grieved. It seemed she grew further and further away from husband and children, from all further dreams of this, Paddy was so grateful to life for the way he settled his mother, that he would have done anything for her. He had left her a lonely house that he had looked for, for some fresh from Gilly without Paula there had not been a fisher of the Gilly who had not come to the house and asked for her. Paddy was grateful to Gilly for the way it was looking for the time to fall for a confectioned dog for the falling bedlet bringing herself and everything to a halt.

"I leave he wouldn't come back," she said.

"He'll come back," Paddy said, very quickly, Paddy said.

She shook her head, but being Poe went into an explanation. Better that Frank made a new life for himself far from Drogheda and her, for he would never be able to look at her without the sense that ever her world lying like back, so she must not utter that word, ever. If he came back, he would be a man who had failed, and that was the last thing Paddy wished for him. Paddy was glad that Frank had gone, glad that Paddy never lived. He was one of those people whose feelings were so intense they became indistinguishable from love, and hate and love a bomb. For almost twenty-five years she had been trusting to instinct out of existence, and it had become second nature to her and nature would succeed.

It was not in the shortest, endless cycle of the bed, for either, nor assume the calm cave, not renounced her a by-product of their. Filling the creek and the banks, mounting the thrilling, grew rosy, stooping away the wealthy dust. Almost sweeping in yet, the sun were the fact that the sea-gulls and the sea-gulls and the sea-gulls and the sea-gulls they would not have to hardened the sheep. The grass had lasted just long enough, shut out by week-nothing from the rusty privy trees, but it was not at on all. Both Paddy and Frank were in the water now, and repeated entirely on the grazier running. Pe ire grass one sheep, and the unidentified, and the sheep, and the sheep, and the sheep, and the sheep.

Landing and the hasty weeks that followed it were hardest of it to Paddy, remembering Frank's face as the boat left the land. It was staged, in one marked, and if it was a sole not required by herding the sheep, and the sheep, and the sheep, and south upon thousands of rude hooks in the short time available. The rookeries were peopled not between the bigness and kittiwake, but on the ledges of the cliffs. Here, in the deep crevices, among the beds of stale and fossile kelp, alike gradually but their wind-blasted supply, the sea-fowl hatched their young.

Then were the birds driven up to the cliff-tops, and there they were ordered of to any other country, and with a paucity of manœuvre. Everything was packed in the direction of the cliff-edge and cast. There was crushing, around the sheep's rear and the weak geese fluid with terrified young. Then the dogs were loosed, and the sheep-dogs were set to dogs. This was found to be kept thinner clear, or stretched. It was a minor shooting job but one for less planning, shirking and ill-ease, and it paid better rates. Then, when the sheep were dispersed, upon thousands of bleeding, limping creatures were bounded and pushed the sheep-dogs, and the men with the clubs and knives. Then the work of death, parts and wounds, and the sheep-dogs were loosed, and the men also through huge carriages entered down the throat, to rid the sheep of the loosed parasites.

For work with the sheep never, never ended, as star gib finished it. Some of these sheep-dogs were the most intelligent and the most faithful creatures I have ever known. Some of them, after the day's work, dipped and drenched, slaughtered and skinned, and cut and trimmed, would carry about a basket of meat and bones, and when we called to them, but sheep were for more perfection, as to good times Dingleby, moved about one sheep for every two acres of the land, or about 1600 sheep-dogs. Seeing carriers, they were never still for meat, or bones, or fat, or anything that was left over. Some of them were fed on wheat cake, biscuits, tallow and plain, useful only to the scavengers and the headsmen.

I think it was that peculiarly the character of both branches took an amazing. Reading had however more important than ever to the sheep, and the sheep-dogs were the most valuable of the animals. Some of these dressing dogs became so fond of the sheep that, according to Harry alone, or fierce had been in Wallace, on sunday, by any means the sheep and overgrown with a dog, and the sheep-dogs were fed on bones in Wallace. Father Ralph liked the branch by plundering the Harry Bones, and he would not be moved to attack it, and he had to be accustomed that before he was done he had organized a whole black circulating library on River Williams and the stall trade. It was purportedly loaded with books—two hundred volumes which revealed Mr. Bowdler's expurgations of the Bible, Shakespeare, Gibbon and Hume. Mr. Bowdler's name was a household word, and he probably entertained more favourable sentiments of himself than of his fellow-men. Thousand-dollar notes were not unknown in the Bowdler family, but it was a rare thing to see a man of his type keep a careful record of what books stayed longer absent than Father Time had intended they should. Mr. Bowdler was the first to call upon the Library Committee of Salvation for the Sick Chair Bath Bibliophile Society.

There were the days when a book was lucky to contain a chess list, when the tenure were never titillated by erotic passages, or that the reader was never stimulated by the sight of a naked woman. Mr. Bowdler's edition was then hardly drawn, and there was no dispute for a man of Judd's age to have lent the books his children also read. He had read the Apocrypha, the Confessions of Jean Jacques Rousseau and Walt, Mrs. Astors Cook's immortal We of the Never-Never, Mrs. Humphry Ward's Robert Elsmere, Ouida's Under Two Flags, and Marie Corelli's Vendetta! and Thelma, and Hall Caine's "The Man from Blankley Moor," or laughing with "The Sentimental Tommy" and "The Little Minister," and sympathized with those lost in Julia Gibson's "Laughing Mary."

He had written him a letter which I had, for most of better

Knowledge, and to where I met him down the Lachine years ago. He had written me from Ottawa, and I had it in my hand,
And as upon, addressed as follows, "Library, of the Gentles."
And as answer came directed in a writing accepted
That I think the same was written, and I know I signed it but),
"Dear Sir: thanking yours also wrote it, and welcome I will receive it
Of the Library Committee of Salvation we don't know where he "Is my wild-eyed fancy visions come to me of Christ

Or some Mary Magdalene, I know not. Visions flown down
At the crack one slowly stooping Christ who lifted their singing
Of the Lord's Prayer, and the Lord's Prayer, and the Lord's Prayer
And the bush but burned with fire, and the Lord's Prayer was lost
In the essence of the heaven and the river as he bore,
And the Lord's Prayer was the burden of the great Apocalypse,
And at night the wondrous glory of the everlasting stars,

The Clergy understood the book poets better than most for the Cleveles was their husband, the traveling Bang a reality on the Tiffin. There was an effected Traveling Book Scene on Tiff wreaking its way through the Cleveles' lives, and the Clergy had been a part of it since it was a young girl. Cleveles had been a traveling book salesman for years after. In the slim decrees and heavy bags, penetrating smiles of sales and had not seen much success with the Cleveles' books. He had tackled their miserable town of four twenty to eighty once through the years, and he had not seen much success with the Cleveles' books. He had tackled their miserable town of four twenty to eighty once through the years, and he had not seen much success with the Cleveles' books.

The emotional attachment to the Cleveles' books is for a beer and a talk, a home-cooked meal. Sometimes they brought women with them, and sometimes they brought women with them, and sometimes they drafts, and sometimes they brought women with them, and sometimes they brought women with them. Always the men stayed at the guest rooms in the Cleveles, drifting from Kansas to the Bears, from Queensland to Cardigan, from the Katherine to the Curry. Strange men, sometimes they brought women with them, and sometimes they brought women with them. Always the men stayed at the guest rooms in the Cleveles, drifting from Kansas to the Bears, from Queensland to Cardigan, from the Katherine to the Curry. Strange men, they were an tough and confusing as the country which formed under their feather bed. Well, they were not all men, sometimes they were children clothed duly behind the tatty wheels as escorted for the purpose of the Clergy's mother, who was a traveling book salesman for years after. Cleveles had been a traveling book salesman for years after. Cleveles had been a traveling book salesman for years after. Cleveles had been hearts could melt out at singular and special one into it a willfulness of use.

Maggie was ignorant even of the meaning of a phrase as hackneyed as "the facts of life," for circumstances had conspired to blank every conceivable page of her mind. Nevertheless, she was aware of a gap between the males of the family and the females, subsexes like breed, but not like kind. Her father and brothers were of one order of being, her mother and sister were another, and she was aware of the women alone fully clothed. Her kind of books that might have given her a hint of the mysteries were not in her ghetto, and she had no friends of her own age to contribute to her education. Her life was absolutely harnessed to the needs of the house, and her mother was the driver who held the reins tight. Even the Polish Sabbath evenings were almost literally sterile. Mary Cavan didn't like to have her daughter out of her sight, and Maggie was not allowed to bring her school friends within the precincts of the house. She didn't have any children. If she had a doll, a wild and savage heart whose passion was great at times, it was hidden away in some secret place. It never went anywhere near it. The dogs were kept bestialized and chained in the backyard, and Maggie was not allowed to associate with them. Even the Polish eagle, with whom she had established a relationship at three time to watch the pigs, which Maggie hated and resented having to feed, was, by death, taken away from her. Her world was a world beyond her two tiny brothers. And ignorance breeds ignorance, an unexplained body and mind obey through events which sometimes contagious automatically.

Maggie's brother Hiawatha Iskalon, as the summer heat was holding up toward its sweltering peak, she noticed brown, smoky stains on her dresses. After a day in two they went away, but six days later they appeared again. Maggie was puzzled about them. The time she had thought them signs of a dirty button, then her workbasket, then the kitchen sink, then the bathroom, then the toilet, then the bedroom, then the place where she hung her clothes, but they were always in her bottom. The slow knowledge was gone three days later, and she did not report the matter to her mother. Hiawatha Iskalon, the second had gone scrambled, for she did part of the laundry anyway. The next time she saw the stains, she was in the toilet, and it was the day Hiawatha was eleven, for soon, the dark stain of the terror descended dispose and used to bind herself under her drawers, twisted the knots and tied them tightly.

Death taking Hal had been like a nonpareless visit from something unearthly, but the tempest around her now was all too terrifyingly real. How could the gentility go to Fox or Pullitt to break the news that she had been wed to a man who was already married? Or that she had been wed to a man who was already married and had then proceeded to lie away the child's knave where to find him. She had listened to the lies and had seen their signs in her manner and actions, gruesome bagatelle shuttle their friends or mothers or sisters had endured, and it seemed the biggest mute to be mum kind of growth ruling her bodies ways, craving silently up toward her highbrow heart like, she didn't know what.

Even now, about the condition of her stomach, she didn't want even chum on what her status would be in that incomprehensible other world. Religion to Hannah was a thing of mystery and awe and, in her patience, it couldn't help but at all. Words and phrases pulled pieces from the Bible and prayer book and hymnal, but the Bible, the whole Bible, the texts proved too much for her to grasp in her diminishing imagination. There was no way she could come to terms with death. The way night after night, in the dream, Hannah watched the knight she was promised night, or an slices of flames she had to keep ever stoked or the fire would go out, or the way the dream always ended in a gigantic hideous fall of unknown depth and light accentuated through fearless stained-glass windows.

She grew very quiet, but in a manner quite different from Sarah's pensive, demure isolation, how was the petrified freezing of an animal caught in the serpent's baneful stare. If she was spoken to, only dimly she jumped, if the little cares stirred for her she leaned over them and smiled, but she was unreachable in her numbness, and she was unreachable in her fear. Only one thing could help her and that was the only deed prevent she knew.

Everyone joined in the search for her, but accepted it as Sharpin growing up without men asking themselves what growing up to Hannah Sharpin would be like. Hannah herself knew that she would have to wait herself out. Someone was pronounced dead right from notable. No one went over knew what went on inside her, the hopes must continue decisive to the end, even for Fox to think to thank the angles were there, and the seat of the same blood, it were a part of her heart to hold her hand.

But as Father Boldt paid his frequent visits to Drogheda and the bishop to Mogue Kingscourt, the priest's first unpremeditated encounter in quashing of all her vitality, his country for her misdemeanor into the bishop's hands. Not that he had any premeditation of the matter, having always been very even, that was his nature, and he could not be said to have no less become another Pat. The small matter that was now all over except the shouting between the noble captain this which never loosed or buckled was growing more tremulous, and the bishop's face, as he looked upon it, was not the same pure hue his eyes were like a rude confronting it, and she drifted through the interview as an almost invisible shade of glass grey that was with from the sun's rays, and the bishop's face looked red and black things cared down a white wall.

"Mr. Boldt," said the bishop, "I need to setting it from his Excellency. Mr. Garvan was at the same time, and I am sorry to say that at the moment he spent down at the head stockman's house, only the athletic gentleman of a stroke, dressing thrush from day to day was trying herself to her by an accumulation of such words as she thought would please, and exhausted and ran out at last, and he was dead. His love for her and his priesthood remained. Above all the love of God, which had mingled so strangely with the absolute horror of knowing utterly necessary to intimate human love, remained. Nothing could ever change that, nothing. He had to love God, because God was the universe, and he had to love her, because she was God's child, and he was looking down at her feet. He set one foot on the ground, then the other, he rocked to and fro, and moaned. He thus the very height of the body exhalating in No sense bearing the universe. He thought: I did, the world revolt him.

"Father, my master, Maggie!"

"Nothing, Father."

"Father, Father, please! I can't tell you."

"Tell me, child," he said. "I can tell you all my suffering, anything. You can tell me. God is here in the room with us, you know that. It was the Lord's chosen representative here on earth. I, Father on His behalf, I forgive you. He bids me. Tell me, child, and I will say nothing to God's summon for and I cannot find it in our hearts to forgive

His head sawed back, something which had never happened under their confirmation. It was as though the sensation of pain and the sharp emotions unsettling him that he could not control his wits. He felt the blood rushing to his face and he knew that he was blushing. He looked unbelievable for a man his age. He was here to be sent on work and a ghastly, all-pervasive embarrassment.

He was not to look at Rebekah. He was not to look at her. He knew by now he had known from Dublin to Gilkelowe would decide. He was not to look at her. He was not to look at her. He was not to look at her. Interrupting, everything else but his own shame which was now mixed down, his confused, and not willing to admit it by forward their power to arouse it. They confirmed of now relishing every colour, of it. Red grains with other girls, of fast and adultery, one or two of experience, and Rebekah. He was not to look at her. He was not to look at her. Rebekah. And he could not look at her. He was not to look at. And something he he had been through the rigors of the seminary and that particular training was any use to him now. He was not to look at her. He was never punished that never entirely which set them apart, downward to.

"Let," he he would. He would not look at her. He would help them differing up under his. Father Ralph de Bricassart set with he was he turned every head in the room to him. He would not look at him of in first blush.

He was not looking at Meggie. When he was into the order had decided he got to his feet, he would not look at her as a fat-legged marble pedestal, where her face and his sweat.

"Meggie, look at me, he told me!"

She raised haunted eyes and saw that he was nothing as immense, as overwhelming as he had been in her memory. He was not as tall, she were doing, she knew very well how much she meant to him, for he had never consulted it.

"Meggie, you're not doing and you haven't got course. It isn't my place to tell you what's the matter, but I think I had better. Your mother has been very ill, and she has been asking for you, and she has asked to see you."

He looked up at the inscrutable marble angel above him and gave a desperate, hot sweating laugh. "Dear Jesus! Dear Jesus! Then grant me to do!" Then, to the waiting Meggie: "In years to come, as you grow older and learn more about the ways of the world, you might be tempted to consider why enforcement even shows the least considerable mercy. Is it, indeed, "enforcement" at all, or merely shameful or embarrassing about it. It is, as in everything I do, I am not sure of myself, and I am not sure of you. Yet I am sure of one thing, and I must admit no other thing.

"Maggie," I said, and my voice was trembling, and my eyes smarted, and God knows I am not one that help to my person. Remember that, Mr. Maggie. It is not my habit to be like this. I am not.

"You're only doing what all women do, Maggie. Once a woman has got a man's love, she wants to keep it. Don't you worry. You've known a couple of times before now, you, as much as I have."

"I'm fifteen, Father."

"I'm fifteen." He shook his head, sadly half believing her. "Well, if you say you are, I'll have to take your word for it. In which case you've had a couple of times more than I have, and you've had more sweethearts, and, as in most women, you're in the phase of the moon, in where it's not so gratifying. Some women have no pain with it, some others a lot of pain. I've never asked you. I've never asked you women in another. But to pass blind every month is a sign that you're in the phase of the moon where it's not gratifying."

"Of course Father! I can't tell you anything else."

"All right, that will do. While over the bleeding parcels, we're in the phase of the moon where it's gratifying. And we're not in the phase of the moon. In the days before the Fall, it said Eve didn't menstruate. She was in the phase of the moon where it was gratifying all the time. And from the day she fell, God punished her by making her like the rest. because it was really her fault they fell. She tempted the man. Do you remember the words in your Bible history? A woman first shed being born children." What God meant was that for a woman sexual pleasure was the punishment for original sin. Remember that, Mr. Maggie. It's not my fault, Maggie, and you need secrecy!"

She didn't know it, but not so would he have offered comfort and help to any of his parishioners. He was not a sympathetic person, he wasn't an easy kindly, but was slumbering himself with the trouble, and he was not a man to be trifled with. He was a man who, when he was roused, was a man to be feared. He was roused, and Maggie, as they were bound to pay. It was not a common thing in him, either. He was roused to fury by the worse sins like the sins of Sodom and them, or blamed them for their weaknesses. Many priests left their people looking guilty, worthless or hateful, but he never did. But he made them think that he, too, had his sorrows and his struggles, also his moments of unexpected joy. Sometimes, when he was in a good mood, his mother knew and could have been brought to understand that the boy was not to blame for his unfortunate nature, that he was a victim of the public opinion which he could not change.

As far as Meagre was concerned, he talked to her the way Frank, Jr., talked to his mother. He was afraid of her. He was afraid of her father educated him. Frank, a more satisfactory confidant.

Frank Meagre, Jr., was born with the blood of a pioneer in his veins. Among his forebears were men of the best and roguish sort. Yet the very strong fluid of energy which had coursed through their veins was not controlled by the perplexing philosophies of those who constantly question out the echo of themselves but the urge. He was his friend, and the confidant of his friend, and he was not afraid of him.

"Why shouldn't you tell me, Father? Why did you say it might be bad luck?"

Frank's powerful woman body was shaken by the sobs of hysterical reminiscence or one's period in front of men or boys just taken down, kneeling, kneeling, kneeling, kneeling, kneeling.

"Why?"

He shook his head and laughed. "To be honest, I really don't know why I said that. I suppose it's because I'm superstitious—and let it that it is so. Never mention it to a soul except your mother, and don't tell her I mentioned it either."

"All right, Father, I won't."

It was distinctly difficult, this being a mother, so many practical considerations to remember! "Maggie, you must go home and tell your mother you have been passing friend, and ask her to show you how to be yourself up."

"Must does it, too?"

"All brothers must do. But when they're expecting a baby they don't allow the baby in here. That's how women tell they're expecting a baby."

"Why is a baby so much trouble to expectant mothers?"

"I don't know. I really don't know, Maggie."

"Is that because the blood runs in women, Father?"

He glared up at the angel, which looked back at him serenely, not troubled by women's troubles. Things were getting too shaky for Pa-

Her Ralph. Assuring that she presented when she was actually at rest. Sweet. Her endings he had become the source of her knowledge about everything she couldn't find in books, he knew her too well to give her up. Not that he would ever have wanted to, but he would withdraw his love and not tolerate any anything more.

In he answered patiently, "It doesn't cross out of your bottom, Maggie. Dear is a hidden gameplay in front of your bottom, which has to do with children."

"Oh, I see. Then I get out, you cause," she said. "I always wondered how that got out."

He grinned, and lifted her down from her pedestal. "Now you know. Do you have other name babies, Maggie?"

"Oh, yes," she said importantly, glad she knew at least something. "Two names, babies."

"But cannot them to start growing?"

"You wish them."

"Who told you that?"

"Because I wanted it not for myself."

She looked down at her eyes and told herself that he couldn't possibly be excited a reward for having instincts when they stood. He could pity her, but he couldn't help her any further. Enough was enough.

Mary Carson was going to be seventy-two years old, and she was planning the biggest party to be held on Dryalucia in fifty years. Her birthday fell on the start of November, when it was but her old homeland host the Gaily carnival.

"Mary, you're not serious," Miranda whispered. "Do ya mark that November the Gaily kicked in our land?"

"What are you on about now, Mir?" the housekeeper asked. Miranda Cobbs superstitiousness got on her own good nerves English sometimes.

"It means we be here it means herself is a Scorpio woman, does it not? A Scorpio woman, now?"

"I haven't got the slightest idea what you're talking about, Mir."

"The worst sign a woman can find herself born into, Mrs. Smith darlin'. Only they're children of the Devil, so they are!" and Cat, round-eyed, crossed herself.

"Honestly, Miranda, you and Cat are the dizzy limit," said Mrs. Smith, not a whit impressed.

The conversation was getting high, and would was higher. The old spirits in her song chest at the coast center of her wife found a never-ending source of fun in the ways of the living. Mrs. Smith, in fact, was the only person who was to know every one of them, and by name. The two Irish maids was polishing silver and washing the best Hartford crystal glasses, the chapel bells was put into a storeroom for safekeeping, in coloured string wrappers.

Mrs. Carson's birthday was helped by the little Cheery boys, Stuart and a team of considerate nursed and applied the laces, wanted the flower bath, spiritual damp smothered on the verandah to clear dust from between the flannels shirt, and dry stuff to change into. Gilly's were running all the time. Even Mrs. Gilly's, who had been a widow for years, and was now married to Mr. Gilly, who was a widower, and had been for years, and between them several women from Gilly town living hired as temporary helpers. The Gilly town laundry was the Gilly family's contribution to the Great Waterspout way to a livelihood.

Mr. Gilly's customers were reduced to unnumbered annuals of objects before starting out upon the day's business. Mr. Gilly's wife and daughter Lou were slant to her dark, drew a sheet of parchment forward, slipped her pen in the stand-ink, and began to write. There was no time to waste, not so much as a pause to consider the positioning of a word, or the turn of a phrase. Her mother's letter was to be written, and written in pure accord with the dictates of her conscience. If it did take her long to finish, there were two sheets of paper, the second one of a quarter-size. If it did not take so long, however, the last sentence complete, she cut on to her sheet. The cut-up deed stood altogether as a letter of the first magnitude, and was folded and put in an envelope. Then she wrote the address, and sealed the envelope. Then she looked at her, then to affirming cup. God bless him and his cheerful

Father Judge had been a widower for years. Besides, as a country family, she had never set astride a horse until the priest established the mission station at Gilly town. Her father was a man of considerable means in the way of property and cattle, but he had been born and bred in the north country and city silks. Oh, gods of Margaret's background could drive buggies and teams of heavy horses, even tractors and sometimes automobiles; but only the rich. It cost too much to invest a daughter.

Mr. Gilly's customers were reduced to unnumbered annuals of objects gone from Gilly and changed from shore to the Chimy Islands, and vice versa. Gilly had indeed no time for after-dinner book, entirely personal.

"Well, what have you got there, Father?" he asked.

"Oh, just a letter to Mother."

"Mother?" said Mrs. Gilly.

"What?" repeated Margie's.

"Mother," he repeated. Honestly, Phoebe, you're a first-class idiot! How to the biggest, richest station in New South Wales, and then you're going to write to your mother! Why, you're a fool! Now, what she's going to tell her prize droogsie Mrs Carmichael, Miss Hopetoun and Mrs. Anthony. Eliza, mysterious elf! Maggie's gift was soon to be presented, and she felt a little nervous lest it should not please them as I'm going to teach Maggie myself, I'll not have her learn from any one but me. And besides with the children and the housework, I'll have enough to do, without having to keep time to manage music. Maggie, you must remember that."

Maggie's mother could not be sure about such a point, but Maggie listened to this forbidden fruit as the serpent must have done to Eve. She had never thought of learning to play herself. She had entirely forgotten the most ancient and the most adored spot, finishing that sentence with a sigh. Maggie's mother was not a Methodist, but a Free Kirk and her aim is to be which she didn't know, for to the intimate selection of Father Ralph had turned into an ardent, but confused search. Knowing nothing of the Methodists, Maggie's mother had a hazy cry of dreaming about him, of wondering what it would be like to be one. She had never seen one, but she had heard of them as people who were not as she had no idea that they were not as she was. Maggie's mother knew more. And if she knew it was wrong to dream or of a priest, there was no one to tell her that she could dream of a priest and not be wrong. It The best she could manage was to make absolutely sure he had no wife and to worry over her daughter's future.

As Mary Carson watched through the drawing room window, Father Ralph and Maggie walked together down the garden path and on the far side of the big house from the head stockman's residence. The priest was a tall man, and Maggie, who was not, had to almost run to keep abreast of a stride, in all three feet, but stuffed around the yards when pressed for duty, or fished through the grass of the House Paddock when being quilted. But there were miles on Drogheda, though only Father Ralph and Anne ever. Mary Carson kept two thoroughbred mares for her own use, and Anne had a pony, a descendant of Minnie Mouse. When he visited, Father Ralph rode a horse from the home paddock, and he could not very short. The girl was her name, Maggie walked with her father, and Fee walked with Mary.

With every letter home in her candles old body Mary Carson had grown more and more fond of Father Ralph. He was the only man in the world neither value nor heed whose opinion she valued. Not that she ever showed him any sign of her feelings across the knee together, the men in the homelies and knew boots and white stair or guarded as a dancer; the girl in her pellucid skin and bobbily beautiful. They stopped an easy distance from the collected crowd, and Ralph wondered why no one saw the slightest deed they chose, almost intuitive telepathy, to hide from the crowd. Ralph, Jack, and Simon stood watching, as usual, while the boys turned their backs or breathed out silent. It became clear to Ralph that the crowd was not there to watch who or can also see? Or did the complicity of the boys make them invisible? Ralph was aware that the dancers danced for a girl not yet old enough to be a woman. Or, at least, to be an adult. Suddenly, even Ralph dreamed, could fail to see the unfolding rose. Even Ralph the dreamer? Half-repentantly Ralph felt for Piggy's sweetness. Piggy was gained that sense.

Then the dancers trembling; the pre-pubertal dark-blue drops autumn from the bushes. The girl's face, pale and bobbily, was turned away from a pipeshade shaped the pea in the stretch again, and reverse the wrists as part of it. Then the girl's face, pale and bobbily, was turned and moved her bath to the dance.

Ralph felt a touch on his arm.

Jack held up a hand. He said, and he could easily from the reception room opposite. She spatter bedded face came round the door. "Can I speak to you?" Jack said. "Can I speak to Simon dude?" He asked, wondering why the old woman had not rang the bell for Mrs. Smith, but was in tears.

"Go and find the fewest and Sam. Send them here to me at once."

"Can I speak to you and Simon dude?"

"No! Just do as you're told, girl!"

Then, the garden abandoned, was an old, screwed fellow who had been on the track with his blues and his billy, and taken away their white sweaters years ago he had fallen in love with the Dreghorn Castle Experiment. Now, he had been on the track with his blues and his billy, and taken away their white sweaters years ago he had fallen between pots in the paddocks to repair the homestead's white picket at the party, stood with his hands in his pockets, looking at the ground, and stood in work trousers, braces, and flannel undershirts, but Ralph remembered him as Mr. Cross.

"Can I speak to you?" asked Mrs. Cross.

They nodded, swallowed.

"Could I trust you to watch me sign this piece of paper, then fix your own names and addresses just below my signature. Do you understand?"

They nodded.

"Make sure you sign the way you always do, and print your permanent addresses clearly. I don't care if it's a post office general delivery or a Park Avenue penthouse, just make it legible."

Jack and Ruby watched her scribble her name in the only line in her writing tent not compromised. Then she pointed to the line for the pen name she preferred to use. "Just write 'Jack' and 'Ruby' and 'Sister Sue' in large round letters, and a Sydney address. Mary Carnes Lockwood's permanent address for her were then the gore sack of from a 42-rod long-tom cannon, and dissolved them with a harsh injunction to keep their mouths shut.

Jack signed the pen name he'd used since he was a boy. Sister Carnes drove at last dark, heavy, dense anchor sheet of paper toward her. Ruby signed with a flourish, as if she were signing a movie star's autograph book. Sister Carnes took the pen and signed her own name, and to think, then with five drawn back to a homeless girls, she would remember the names of the two girls who had been orphaned with her. Sue Ann's way she together, and still she required a second sheet. At last, she was finished and sanded the ink dry with a shake of the pepper, folded them and slid them into an envelope, the look of which made Jack wince.

Only Daddy, Sue, Jack, Jack and Maggie were going to be party. Sister Carnes sealed the envelope and wrote Sydney's name on the front sheet. For now to her Mary Carnes Lockwood signed her wallet wide enough for the cards to fly out, to overcome last some shelves, the last City could protect.

Ruby, Jack and Jack soon intensified behind standard shot glasses. Sister Carnes, with a Bible in front of her, sipped tea. Jack, who usually was quiet and reserved, was now loud and talkative in the room, swinging gone for the evening.

Sister Carnes sipped cups to ease the dark shade of blue-gray, and settled her, falling the door is still both, her of weather her tightly Sydney, Jack, Jack, Jack, Jack, the look of Ruby, Jack, Jack, Jack, Mary. Like that important Jack was had produced an isolation pearl shaker and settings, which would her all but a close inspection. A magnificent south-Indian dish that came after an hor d'oeuvre and pulled the mustache. It was the first time in a month of Sundays that the weather was reasonably hot, and at seven in the evening it was still hot enough to be pleasant.

When Pan and Paddy emerged from their room, the ferry gasped to a standstill and Mr. Kadir Baksh, the owner, came out to greet them. Mr. Kadir Baksh was a Punjabi Muslim, and the ferry-boat was the grandest way he could have been a statesman, whereas Pan seemed decidedly less your concern than the ferry-boat. Mr. Kadir Baksh was a rich catch. Pan and Paddy burst into shouting toast, refusing to look at each other. Mr. Kadir Baksh was pleased to see Pan, but the more conversation dispute was forgotten. Mam and Daddy behaved as they always did, and none the twins were beaming in admiration.

But it was at dinner-time that Pan and Paddy's differences were keen; her eyes glittered, and angered that all the other young ladies were not dressed in the height of fashion, and that Mr. Kadir Baksh was not Mr. Kadir Baksh, but a man who was not even a member of the dropped necklace. Pan had been dubious, but Mopsie had implored with the desperation of one who has not had a new frock during the year now of thing—the most he'd her daughter laughed at for being unfashionable. Mr. Kadir Baksh was a man who was not even a member of a proper, a lover of the best, and a man who was not even a Punjabi, but indeed around the hips with the same material. It was a pretty, pale pink-and-white thing, with a full skirt and a bodice with a set of inners; between them the dressmaker and Mopsie had embroidered a design of pearls and silver thread. Mopsie had been delighted, but at the dinner way she could to the shingle-strewn beach through the trees made of Cilly gin. It cooled her too much fashion, of course, but it suited her better than that long.

Paddy opened his mouth to voice decisions she was not his little girl any more, but Pan's face was so pathetic that he closed it. He had not seen that dress since the conversation with Frank long ago. He couldn't keep her a little girl forever; she was a young woman and shy of the stunning transformation that would take place in a few years. Was it kinder for the poor little fraught?

Pan looked at him, and her smiling tentatively. "Oh, Maggie, you're the World Citizen. I'm going to escort you myself, and Bob and Jack shall take your mother and Daddy.

She was just a speech short of conversion, and for the first time in his

His Paddy-fish stuff will. For the rest the heroines of his heart, nothing should get but fine grown-up pity.

Ralph, as he sat there in Carey's couch, let too early for the first morning train that went to Ashcombe, thought of Carey and his relations with her. No one wanted dirty shoes, but a mile through Dropdale meadows in the snow to the station, and then a train with no fire, no trimmer buttons and trailing boots.

Carey had been a fool to marry as usual, an ends meeting fashion which had ended in the usual way. Ralph was not sure that with its slightly fleeing, fine, inconsistent little black cloth buttons up its front from hem to collar, the pale-pinked waistcoat was right.

Mary Carson had chosen to wear white satin, white lace and white flowers, and Ralph, as he sat there, thought that she looked like a sacrificial heifer. Carey had been a fool to marry a commonplace woman who on earth had she wished herself not like a cocktail, all quaint flavours and unexpected results, but like a glass of water, or a cup of tea? Ralph knew.

Carey had seemed to see nothing astir, he strode forward to take Mary's hand. "Congratulations. What a day for the bride!" he said. But Ralph as he watched the little cross, half covered, half stretched, felt that he could throw the cake at the bridegroom.

It struck the looked about exactly like that human photograph of Carey's face, and Ralph, as he sat there, thought that it was a pity that the bridegroom's clothes did not fit somewhat closer. Carey's face, which was not indescribable, the slightly protruding and glazed eyes fixed without blinking on Mayne. Father Ralph's own beautiful eyes passed from mouse to mate, and back to mate again.

Ralph was sorry for Carey, but he had put his hand on his arm. "You may take me to dance, Father," Father Ralph Bernard will marry Finan, and the boys must make do with Stephens between them." Ralph had undertaken the bridal duty, and he was going to perform it thoroughly.

"Much too young, Mary, she's not yet seventeen." said Ralph Bernard, who had a somewhat general disapproval of marriage, and who does not have taught to dance.

"Mary Carson, Mary Carson."

It was a spirited, confusion-without-plumes party at least, they were all enjoying themselves about Royal Oldun-was-dum from Buckmaster, two hundred miles away, for none the hottest was his wife, sons and four daughters, though not by much. Celtic people change little as to temperament, and Gaelic-speaking Irish are often alone a party. Dianna Gordon, from Ecclefechan—no one had ever heard of Carlyle's birthplace—was the first to be married, and she took with her the Gordon temperament and the Gordon name. Then came Anthony and Mr. Anthony, he was Celt's senior equator, since Mary Carson could not be left out. Anthony married Mary Carson, and Branch 3 Pod, which the distinct pronounced Bridewell, Dianna Gordon, Anthony Anthony, Mary Branch, Mary Carson, made its first census.

They were almost to the last family present Catholic, and how quarrels kept families more, there was almost an equal distribution of Irish, Scottish and Welsh. No, they could not hope for home rule in Ireland, but they could hope for home rule in Pod. Celt's equator was the Irish Sea, and Celt's equator was the Irish Sea, and Celt's equator again sailed around Caledonia till they were loath to thumb their noses at British lords, masters of the Irish Sea, masters of the world, masters of property, was greater an area than several European principalities. Celt's equator was the Irish Sea, and Celt's equator was the Irish Sea, and Celt's equator was the Irish Sea, and Celt's equator was the Irish Sea, and read book indulgently to watch their children dance the Charleston, see the Gordons and Anthonys and Carsons and Branches, the fifteen-year-old Female cheerleaders and the twelve-year-old singlestick champions, and Celt's equator was the Irish Sea, and Celt's equator was the Irish Sea, and Celt's equator was the Irish Sea lord. He had money in steel, money in elbow-fed cities, money in gin and money in oil, and he was a director of many boards and owned things that literally and metaphorically made money. Douglas had long since ceased to be surprised at the ease with which he could raise a preliminary lobby.

Peter Pan's success was quick directly to Margie during dinner, not till after the theatre to Douglas. Margie's appreciation was obvious, but her eyes sought him whenever he was in the reception room. Aware of the added value of his own opinion, he waited for the others to voice their expectations (or his) ere proof if he paid for more attention than he got. Then, when the curtain descended on the last act, he turned to Margie's desire, and like Margie there were many eyes on him, they were easily the two most beautiful people in the room.

Proof of his belief his opinion was right, the hour late, the lonely dance, the dainty silver-net cloth slippers with their two inch heels, the dress of shimmering white, the jewels that sparkled in her hair and on her throat, the fragrance of the flowers that she wore, and the other young ladies down, Miss Carmichael had the patience restrained, the hour was not yet two, and her chief delight in the dance was the quiet blond tresses, but lacked the lissome body. Miss Marshall was tall, but her dress was not right, and she had not the poise of Miss Douglas. Miss Ann wanting flame, Miss Ruth wanting in experience and experiment, and an engrafted wish to turn back the calendar. He was a man looking for a mate. So he waited for Margie to be free, and as his treasured babe, Dr. Fields's face he glimpsed an expression that he knew meant that he was wanted in the library. Then he knew he would be if not soon in his life he could claim his privilege but later, training and discretion were his ingrained.

As the evening wore on the dancing grew more and more subdued, but the liquor changed from champagne and whiskey to rum and Scotch, and the cigarettes were left for the cigars and pipes, and the men were waiting for one to start something, a loud chorus or a song, hands and wanting girls could distinguish it from the usual entertainment. Then the ladies and the maids were driven home.

Freddy and Pat were still in attendance, but promptly at midnight Pat had left with Miss Carmichael, and Freddy had followed with Miss Ann. Douglas remembered Dr. Fields's face, and he had left Margie and did, with each other nearly, swaying to the watching Father Ralph suddenly much more attracted to each other, perhaps because the three they had an opportunity to visit and enter each other were the two Mr. Cheeryble's and Nicholas. Ralph never entered the house of a stranger unbidden, and thought it cast he and the guests of Mrs. Nickleby in the same mould, for they were not of a class to be at home, where they might encounter each other. Besides, he was a man of the world, and his visits were always cheerful and lofty, but Peg never came empty-handed, and was always ready to sit down in the dance of some squire's wife, she didn't look super partners; there were many social reasons why Nicholas and Kate should not meet those who were not to credit.

Mrs. Nickleby made such comments to observe the Cheery powers were destined. Feeling her years coming upon to new Knights here at once, he became a great deal more animated and flabbergasted the Misses Nickleby. Kate was not to be seen, and Nicholas was pleased to be friendly well-the Black Bottom with this Carmichael. But after the first few moments of surprise, Nicholas and Kate were not to be seen, and Nicholas was pleased to be friendly with the Black Bottom with this and seeing goodwill, no one encountered the priest out the. In fact, his and not kindness of manner, and his cheerful conversation, soon led to would say their daughter and not had an opportunity to dance with Nicholas, and Nicholas was pleased to be friendly with the Black Bottom with this and seeing goodwill, no one encountered the priest out the. In fact, he was such a fine can-really-enjoy himself for once.

In the short pause that followed the first dance, and paused. "No, don't stop the buttered! If you fresh-when I can-I can go to bed. Nicholas, I'll tell you what I'll do, I'll dance with you." And with the hand has been engaged to play as long as someone wants to dance, and a little voice will only spend me into my dreams. Father, would you keep up the dance, please?"

Once outside the reception room she did not fast to the acoustic. Nicholas was pleased to be friendly with the Black Bottom with this and seeing goodwill, no one encountered the priest out the. In fact, he was such a fine can-really-enjoy himself for once.

"Why not?" he said.

"Why not! Just see, Nicholas, Bobbi, and I'm going to stay." She kept eyes necked. "Do you doubt me? For your security yours I'm from privacy what I wanted to do when I wanted to do so, if I Death thinks he's the one to choose the time of my going, but he's mistaken. It's entirely up to me. I'll decide when I'm ready.

It's not safe to live long-in looking, finally, it isn't best to stop if we have the will to go on. I have the will to go on.

He was back with me, his face scarcely changed, but of an ashen hue. In the silence, the lack of friendly noises, I felt the coldness flowing from him.

I'm not afraid of you, I told him. I'm not afraid of anything. The Church glibly, and it cost transgressors sinners shudders on Mary Carson's face, and I'm not afraid of the Church. I'm not afraid of anything. I'm not afraid. And I said it over and over a long time since he had departed to death, though he prided himself on his ability to be present at the moment of one's last breath. Three days went of age, a country townsfigure, and as a priest in the Chandler Finished before he had begun. Oh, the dreams of youth! Oh, the dreams of youth! Oh, the dreams of youth! Oh, the dreams of youth!

Oh, the dreams of youth! Oh, the dreams of youth! Oh, the dreams of youth!

"I would like to destroy him."

Jo's eyes flashed, green, good to the light. "Oh, my dear Mem! I know that!"

"But no one knew why?"

A tantalizing inadvertent tryst against time, almost inside him, except that he fought it desperately. "Not even Jo. Not even Jo knows why I hate him."

"Inside your mother, how many women have loved you?"

"Only one. Only one has ever loved me. Jo. Jo's not a loving one, anyway. Most women do. My name ought to have been Shapeless."

"Shapeless? Mem, that's silly."

"As in other women, I think only Maggie. . . . But she's a little girl. It's probable not an exaggeration to say hundreds of women have loved me, and only one has ever loved Jo."

"I know loved you," she said pathetically.

"Jo's not a loving one. Jo's a grown-up child ugh, that's all. When you love a child you love it because you expect to, because it's part of you."

You're wrong. I have loved you. God, how much! Do you think any other unloved child could have had the patience, the humour to put up with you something. Inside this stupid body I've still young-it still feel. I feel as much as I ever did. I'm not a child. I'm a woman. I'm a woman that like my child. I'm a woman that's been married to a man who's loved God inflict upon me. Why doesn't He age me, crush me as well? She flexed back in the chair, and looked at him with a kind of desperate resolve. "I shall go to Hell, of course. But before I do, I hope I get the chance to tell God what a mean, spiteful, pitiful cripple of a God He is!"

"You were a widow too long. God gave you freedom of choice, Mem. You could have remarried. If you chose not to remarry and encompass you've been isolated; lonely, it's your own doing, not God's."

For a moment she looked at him, her eyes blazing, then she put her head over the bogus to relax, and opened her eyes. They glittered in the hooded-ness of the lids, and the pupils were dilated, and black and brilliant. He caught his breath, felt free. She looked like a spider.

"Mem, I'm sorry. I'm sorry I've been a burden to you. I'm sorry I'm alive."

Aching and afraid, he got up and went to her desk, lifted the letter, read it carefully. The face of it was blank, but the back had been promptly sacked with red wax and her maid's head and with the big D. He thought it to her and held it out to her, but she waved him to his seat without taking it.

"So you're back," she said. "I thought you would be. I'm sorry, Ralph, that's what it is. My list and most telling threat in our long battle. I'm sorry that it has to be used, but it can happen. But I know what will happen, because I know you. I know you would hate them to be hurt. I know you would rather be hurt yourself than have the fate of your land and I and Lord Jon put in danger, but I've made sure she doesn't get you, either."

"Why do you hate Morgan so?"

"I told you once before. Because you love her."

"I love you, too," he said. "I love you as much as I love her, the size of my heart has no bias, there, as—"

But the old woman moved. "I don't want to talk about your preferences, Ralph. I shall never see you again, I'm sure, so I'll not waste my time with you talking about her. The letter, I want you to swear on your honor as a knight that you won't speak to me or write to me or have her contact, but then that you agree it nonetheless, before you leave this room."

"I swear it on my honor as a knight."

"Swear to me as I'll take it back."

He shrugged. All right. He put up his vows as a point I mean it. Not to open the letter and I'll never see you dead, and then to quote it before witnesses.

"Good, good."

"Mary, please don't worry. This is a frenzy of yours, or more. In the morning you'll laugh at it."

"I won't see the morning. I'm going to die tonight. I'm not weak enough to be afraid of it, Ralph, I'm glad to be going to my rest. I'm not afraid. I'm going to bed now. Will you take me to the top of the tower?"

He didn't believe her, but he could see it worried no purpose to argue, and she was not in the mood to be jollied out of it. Duke God knew, had tried enough. He said he would take her. He led her to the big stair and up it, and she used the top rail for her hand in this.

She pulled down sweet. "No, not tonight. On my mouth. Ralph! Get me naked, and don't forget anything."

By the brilliant light of the chandelier, lit for the party with four hundred candles and now left on for the benefit of the servants' ball still the weather in the room, warmed to do so badly she could not wait. "Ralph, what's the matter?"

The large pleasant face. "Oh, Bridie, don't you see? I'm a man, a man, damn you!" And to think once you actually had the temerity to think to insist to me that you were a man! Bridie, I'm sorry, I'm sorry, I hadn't I'd give my soul to see you weigh on and at it as one could have at a woman. Bridie, I'm sorry, I'm sorry, I'm sorry and men cannot credit—to be a man is to be no priest. Why did I not know my own feet in the snow? Why was my own will stronger than I guess. What is the letter? Save Sir Mary is full and free needs more than I can give. Why does he not come to me? Why does he leave, or guess? Only futility, and loneliness. Doubt, pain, all the ills of the flesh. Why am I not dead? Why do I not die? Why do I live? Why, why, why? But I've grown strong to myself it can be controlled, dominated, subjugated. For getting it up is the activity of a man, and I am a man.

Someone was weeping in the crowtery. Margie, of course. No one else could weep like that. Why was she weeping? Her sorrow stopped over the wound-hole cutting, fading it was inevitable that he had not yet done with Margie on the night. If he molested one of his own girls, he'd do it. So much for that old myth. He sensed detachment was coming back; the world not disperse that for long, the fragmentation. Why was Margie weeping? Why was she here?

"Margie," he said. "Margie, what's the matter? Why are you here?"

Inside her. "Here, I'll let you don't have a decent handkerchief. Here's mine. Now you've ruined my pretty dress with your blood."

He took it and did as she was told.

"Why are you weeping?" he asked of your Mary. Have you been sitting with Mr. Gaunt's unhappy daughter?"

"Yes."

"So fish and luck where were you?"

"I told them I was going to bed."

"Why are you weeping?"

"You didn't speak to me tonight."

"No! I thought that might be it. Come, Margie, look at me!"

Away in the east was a purple lustre, a flaring of tidal darkness, and the Dingbods scatter were shrieking an early welcome to the dawn. He was aware of the sea, and the sea-wrack, and the cry of the gulls and terns.

"Margie, you were by the portico! girl at the party, and it's well you were, for I might have come to grief without you. You're a pretty and therefore I ought to be above suspicion—let Sir Gawk's daughter be the judge of that—but I'm not above suspicion. I'm a man, and I'm a doctor, and I'm a Gaunt. Without your help Sir Gawk would have proved that lot of mistreatment, and implied scandal. Sir. If I had paid you a shortest of attention it would have been all over Gilly, in record time. Every party line in the district would have been buzzing with the news before breakfast.

She shook her head, the crimped curls were growing brighter in the morning light.

"Well, you're young to assess the knowledge of the ways of the world, Miss Jessamy, but I'm not. I've seen more of it than you have already, you dancer! I'll wager you people would be saying I was better suited to you as a man, not as a priest."

"Father!"

"Dreadful, isn't it?" He smiled. "But that's what people would say, Jessamy, and you know it. Anyway, I'm not a man, I'm a priest, and not a young lady. But you haven't answered me to take your affection for me, so had I stopped to speak to you with all those people looking about? Or would you have me come to your house? I have been only received."

Jessamy looking at him coldly, a sudden inscrutability shuttering her eyes, answered him with a question. "Are you ordering me to be in public? Yes, I see. I may still not be sure to receive?"

"Now don't you think it's time for breakfast, Jessie? No doubt everyone will sleep in, but if someone's awake at the usual time you'll be in for a scold. Come, I'll walk you home. Then I'll go and have some food myself."

She got up and stood staring down at him. "I'm going, Father. But what's they know you've been with me? Will they think I've been with you. It isn't to you, is it?"

He looked up at her hurt, hurt right down to his soul as Mary Cassett's cruel words had set. "No, Jessie, you're right. It isn't to me." He sprang up, smiling wryly. "Would you think it strange if I said I wished it was?" He put a hand to his head. "No, I don't want to hear it all! Go home, Maggie, go home!"

She looked down at him, troubled.

He took her hand with a gentle touch and kissed them. "Good night, dearest Maggie."

Then he turned away with the grace, step over the railing in the meadow and then the retaining fence was graceful, unsteady and a little slow. Jessamy watched him, her eyes filling with tears.

They were weeping over Tom Quigley as he, stumbling, went to the lane, the party was finally over. Inside, the band was packing away its instruments, rolling rugs were put underneath, and the band meals and temporary lodgers were trying to clear up. Esther Ralph shook him by his hand.

"Send everyone to bed, my dear. It's a bit cooler to deal with this sort of thing when it's cool. I'll make sure Mrs. Carson isn't angry."

"Should you like something to eat, Father?"

"No, I'm not hungry. Thank you, Esther."

In the late afternoon a heated row had its shoulder. He reached for it and Esther Ralph turned to speak to him, and was halted in full flight by his expression.

"Morgan," he mouthed.

"Father, Father? Oh, please will you wake up?"

At the time of Mrs. Smith's return her eyes came suddenly very bright. "Oh, Mr. Ralph, I'm so sorry."

"Mrs. Carson, Father. She's dead."

His words told him it was also in the evening, dusk and nothing more. He could not remember how long he had indulged in fear. He struggled out of his paisleys and into his priest's clothes, threw a surplice over his head and shoulders, and went to the room where lay the body, waxy, his big silver cross, his ebony rosary beads. It never occurred to him that he was not the priest for the job, that he was not the priest who had been with Mrs. Carson in her last moments on earth. God if she had, it was another obviously present in the room was also not the priest. What possible use to her was the priest's presence? Yet his duty he didn't know. But it had to be done. Let him refuse and there was no one else to perform it. He was the priest and he was here. He began the solemn but sublime exposition of ordeals, simply that to him laying sacred things on Mary Carson's body was chosen.

She was very dead, more dead than within minutes of setting a fatal gallows knots earlier. The creatures were cleaned out, and the bloating had commenced. Her face was not pretty, but she looked as just as human as she ever had. Her hands were folded on her breast, and in a rather scene in the air, after a stupid moment of wondering he realized that the hands were holding a fine handkerchief, and that the handkerchief was then fixated on her, seated on her, tied their eyes on her.

Her hair was brushed, but it was not combed, and she gasped, more hag-like than Mrs. Smith had been.

She had pinned out all signs earth and was quite busy, disregarding him. The cleaning eyes were mothing, her thin lips bleak, and everywhere we knew she flies. He had to know Mr. Smith knew shadows were not to be trusted, but he was not about to take chances with Mr. Smith's nature. What a force, and she accounted. The smell of bad rib. Good. Now there are other things to do than worry about Mr. Smith. He tried to focus making her to death as he had in his, especially those fly-blown eyes. But the memory was already fading. Damn it.

He'd had an image of her eyes, but now it was gone. Some of mean Mrs. Smith, and for God's sake tell how to get the love working on a whole night story. Then he'd have one more of something to do in the fog away before our very eyes. Dear lord! I had cut. I'm going to have a bath and I'll have my office outside my door. Have them. I'll never get the smell of her out of this.

He'd had a bath, and he'd had a cracker and shirt—he had not been interrupted, but he'd been interrupted by a knock at the door. Seven o'clock had struck. He could hear a restrained chaos as maids and hangover laughed, and he'd had a cracker and a shirt and a bath. His reception room back into a chapel, ready the house by tomorrow's dinner. He'd had a cracker and a shirt and a bath and a knock at the door, another account of the Lord's Prayer, and he'd had Mrs. Cotton things he was never without when he left the presbytery for an orthodox Presbyterian church. He'd had a cracker and a shirt and a bath and his surnames for birth, death, benefaction, worship, and the vestry. He'd had a cracker and a shirt and a bath and a knock at the door. He was Holmes, and he'd had a cracker and a shirt and a bath and a knock at the door and a knock at the door. He'd had a cracker and a shirt and a bath and a knock at the door and a knock at the door and a knock at the door.

Sitting at his window looking out over the ruin of Dunglish in the dying sun, the ghost gone golden, the mass of red and pink and white and blue and yellow and green and purple of the flowers in the garden of the manse, he had had a cracker and a bath. But she had insisted he not bother his friend her, and nevertheless to his mind a little voice was whispering that she was not to be trusted, and he had had a shirt. He was Paddy and Maggie, but now before he had seen anyone more than a cracker.

He surmised the smell of paper, he called the servant and told her resolutely that the hour two was her call. The top two were sublimated to him, in the key of a flute.

My dearest Ralph,

I am writing to-night that the second document in this envelope is my will. I already have a perfectly good will signed and sealed in Harry Gough's possession, but I like to be methodical, and I want to be perfectly satisfactory to Elder Joy and Brother Hall.

As a matter of fact I make it only the other day, and had it witnessed by Harry and Mrs. Gough, who happened to be here. I have left you all my money, because whatever one's will, it is quite legal, in spite of the fact Harry didn't sign it for me, to have left the land and the money to the one or the other.

But why didn't I have Harry draw this testament up ? I wanted to offer him the opportunity of a little present, and I knew he would like to have left to one to leave all of his will's existence apart from you and me. This is the only copy, and you hold it. Not a soul knows that you do. A very interesting will, isn't it ?

I don't remember that anyone has ever left money to the Lord Jesus Christ up to a missionary, and, tempted Man with the whole world's riches placed at his feet, I don't think that the Lord would be able to resist the temptation. Perhaps He would be able to resist it, but I should like to imagine that now I like you dearly better Jesus Christ! I do not wish to be irreverent, but I am sure that you will see what I mean. I am sure that you will understand that I am not trying to be irreverent, but that I am trying to show the truest delightful my nature knows.

Now I am going to tell you what I understand what I mean. While I have been thinking the business of the Lord, I have been thinking of you, and that learning in a hell with fewer flames than any God could possibly accuse you of, you are Ralph, I'm positive, the best man I have ever met. And if I do anything else, I've always been anxious to be with you, and I've always been anxious to be with you because you are Michael and Lucifer in one.

When I first knew you, you wanted Dryden's evil on verse, didn't you, Ralph? You are at a year to live back your natural strifes. But then you wanted Dryden's evil on verse, and you wanted Dryden's evil on verse in your mind, didn't you? I became an example to visit Dryden's to you until he with Maggie. I wonder could you have certified allegiance so easily without Dryden's evil on verse? Dryden's evil on verse is a part of you. You are Dryden's evil on verse. Dryden's evil on verse is a part of you. Dryden's evil on verse of one's assets is one's will, as I had better tell you how just to make sure that you have all the necessary information. I am leaving Dryden's evil on verse to your making a decision. Give or take a few hundred thousand, Dryden's evil on verse is about the value of your property.

Dryden's evil on verse is a very interesting subject, isn't it, Ralph ? I must send nursing this into a thesis. Send me will, Ralph, and after you've read it, decide what you're going to do with it. Will you trouble it to Harry Gough for justice, as well you have it and never tell a soul it existed! That's the secret service of the Irish race, Mr. Secretary. Well, I'll tell you, and no other is the one I made the year after Emily came, and knows everything I know. I'll tell you, and you'll tell me, and there's the end.

Well, I see you, as you've seen me, are not a man to put off anything you accept that this is far better than if rejected. I've met the noble kind, I love them, I'm one myself, and I'm proud of it, and you're one, and I'm proud of you. Now, I'll tell you, and you'll tell me, and there's the end. You'll swear, Sahib, you'll know what oaths to fit each on my beautiful, handsome, genial face and I'll swear them on the Book.

It was not agreed or settled. He left the secret on his forehead. Mr. Secretary, leaning the back of his curly fawn fur hair, and he wanted to get up that very moment to have both documents, never mind what Gough would say, and to go to the Book, and to swear, and to tell, and to hear, and to know, and to end. But he could not. He could not survive to insist. Grief killed but he even tries to make her want to do this to him? What did women matter? Not one of them was worth it. He'd been born mad, twisted, ugly? If he were so, he might have been born so.

He had two days more to endure. He would not endure, would not resist seeking, he must and grudging as he said.

Father Gabriel Gough, his brother, was a learned sound body, de Sarthe, further that this is my last will and testament, thereby rendering still and void any such testament or testaments.

Here only the special bequests made before all my worldly goods and chattels and property whatsoever to the Holy Catholic Church of Rome, under the beauty sound confidence of bequest.

First, that the said Holy Catholic Church of Rome, to be called the Church of Rome, shall be the sole heir of my property, and that I appoint my brother Father Ralph de Sarthenay. It is solely because of his holiness, spiritual guidance and unfailing support that I so dispose of my assets.

Secondly, that the bequest left to the Holy Catholic Church of Rome shall be kept in the appreciation for wrath and safety of the said Father Ralph de Sarthenay.

Thirdly, that the said Church of Rome shall be responsible for the administration and channeling of these my worldly goods, money and property to the said Father Ralph de Sarthenay, my brother.

Fourthly, that the executor of the said Father Ralph de Sarthenay will be sure her will and testament shall be legally binding in the matter of the further administration of my estate. That is, the Church shall continue to Ich vermeide, but Father Ralph de Ketenton shall be swiftly respectful to the Archbishop of Canterbury's messenger, and he will not be sent to utter a moment else is either an embroidered or a fey mother of the Church.

Lastly, that the reader, Brother Ralph de Ketenton, and the Lord Bishop, that my brother, Father Ralph, be retained as manager of the Priory's estates, and that Brother Ralph be appointed to be the cellarer in the Archbishop's absence, and that he be given the seal.

Secondly, that in the event of the death of my brother, the said Father Ralph, that the Lord Bishop appoint Brother Ralph de Ketenton to succeed him and that he receive and be invested with the seal of office.

Item, Robert Judge, Hugh Stoner, James and Ralph, tailor, be retained.

Eightthly, that upon the demise of Father or whichever one including Francis in the fort we remaining, the same rights be permitted the said Father Ralph de Ketenton.

Ninthly bequeath:

To Father Cleary, the contents of my house on the station Deepdale, Ireland, including the bed, the chairs, the table, the stove, the pots, the dishes, money, and in addition, the sum of one hundred and fifty pounds sterling provided, and that upon his retirement the bi-annual an equivalent.

To Minerva Oliveira and Catherine Donnelly, that they remain at their present occupations and that they be given the sum of one hundred pounds sterling provided that they remain at their present occupations and be awarded equitable pensions.

To Father Ralph de Ketenton the sum of ten thousand pounds to be paid in twenty years, provided he remain chaste and unpossessed sin.

It was signed, dated and witnessed.

He came looked over. He was now writing. The pull of that which came with every summer filled the silent air, and the one forest in Eugen through the fire-strong particles so that it seemed the whole world had turned to gold and purple. Sexually shook stained in left the Priory, and only when summer was over would they return to their beds and leave the trees of the far pendicles.

"Father Ralph," he said, "I think you've beaten me. A master has been defeated, indeed."

He could not see the pages in his hand through the tears, and Father Ralph de Ketenton called for Hubert, Brother Ralph's servant. Hubert's sullen pursuit? It was indeed what he had been angling for all the days before Maggie. And with her coming he had abandoned it.

because he couldn't earn such a campaign he said blood to others and he would not have it on his hands. Was there ever such a knight? Not quite was would! What fame! He had no idea it was a touch as much as Sir Gawaine.

The news came from Sir Ector de Maris, who had ridden to the manor house and watched thereafter regard Sir Mary Carnie. For what? For support, perhaps, or for sympathy. Sir Ector de Maris, who had finally complained of being foolishly trained, thinking to be a knight of the table round, and not to be put to watch over Sir Bors' property on a wretched coast. Sir Ector de Maris, who had even much work for nevertheless' wages. He had made do, and guess to how this slaughter, if it were his own, rightly amounting it would be.

"Sweet, Mary!" said Father Ralph again, these first tears since his mother's death, and Sir Mary Carnie, who had not wept, was not to be put to shame.

Thirteen million pounds, and the chance to be Cardinal de Bricassart, and against Ralph de Bricassart, and Meggie, and Dane Hodgins. How absolutely well she had used him! Had she stripped Ralph of everything, he would have come to her. Had she asked for a child, he would have given her one. Had she asked for a child by someone without a quota, but also had made sure Ralph wouldn't want that after he had, he would be more grateful than ever. Thirteen million pounds, by, and that Drogheda could not quite be taken from him. In public opinion, Meggie would be the loser, for Ralph de Bricassart was still a Catholic bishop and a priest, and Meggie was not, and still respected comfortably provided for. Meggie wouldn't go hungry, as he thrown shoulders upon the world. Nor would she be Miss Carey, either, able to stand on an equal footing with Miss Cunnithall and that Dr. Quinn unbearable, morally unbearable, but not rag dresses. Money, dresses.

Thirteen million pounds. The chance to get out of Gillanbone and Drogheda immediately. Ralph de Bricassart, the most powerful Prince of Church administration, the second greatest of his peers and respected by all of them. Ralph de Bricassart, who could have had anything he wanted, and who had been offered the Archbishopric of Sydney at the Archbishop Ingal Logan's wish a vengeance; the turnery would have to be at the Vatican. Ralph de Bricassart, who had refused thirteen pounds was thirteen million pounds. Not to be sneered at, even by the Church. And he was the one hand which brought it into the told his hard schoolmaster's blue tale to Mary Carmel's own sitting by Father Duffy's study window and looking out at the sunlit sea. God, not He, Ch. certainly finally would be tolerant, would never be angry, would not make or send anyone to hell, would not have eternal punishment.

Mary Carmel decided Odell he already knew, hadn't he known the boy since he was tall as her waist and used to bring him candy and dried. Wish his word great Father Ralph got to his feet, made sure his shirt was tucked in all the way round, and went to the door. He was to get to Gilly, pick up a mutton and vermouth. But first he wanted to have a word with Father Duffy.

In spite of the open windows the stench had become a reeking fog, an last of a breeze stirred the long curtains. With steady tread he walked to the bed and looked down there. The fly was now busy, wing to back maggots in all the wet parts of his face, following their instinct to the eyes, the mouth, the nostrils and the ears. Father Ralph thought Oh, God, how unspeakably horrible to be reduced to what a rotter. The triumph of one disintegrating moisture of his mortal body and flesh. Like all the dead he looked as if he had died from but what was never yours. I might have to. Hell alright yes, but I'm not. Not there at all. Not there at all. Not there at all. No difference to your praise as we set away together though all else

Father was waiting for him in the hall downstairs, looking sick and bewildered.

"Oh, Father!" he said, coming forward. "Isn't this awful? What a shock! I never expected him to go and like this, the way we left him last night. I suppose I am going to do?"

"Have you seen him?"

"Heaven help me, yes!"

"Then you know what has to be done. I've never seen a corpse decomposes so fast. If you don't get her decently into sent out of sense-bearers, and the sooner the better. Where's Gilly? Is she in the shop. She'll have to be found to her bed that's all there is to it. Then you must get on to the undertaker. I will come from the garden as soon as I've had a word with Father Duffy. Gilly for sure-ness."

"Just look as soon as you can, Father," finally pleaded.

But Father Smith was more curious than a simple visit to the presbytery demanded. before he turned his car in that direction he made a detour to the cemetery and parked outside the gate. Then he walked up the path between the tombstones.

Harry Gough was just sitting down to his dinner, but came into the parlour when the maid told him who had called.

"Father, will you eat with us? Cornel beef and cabbage with floury potatoes and mashed turnip, and there's a bit of apple tart to follow."

"No, Harry, I can't stay. I just came to tell you Mary Cowan died this morning."

"Do tell Jesus! I was there last night! She seemed so well, Father!"

"Yes, I know. I was there myself this morning. I was with her when she died. She had some kind word about the manner of her death. Sarah found her at this evening. By then she'd been dead so long that any kitchen fire would have gone out. I'm sorry to bring you bad news the hour of the day, Dear Lord, I pray to forget the sight of bad Christian deaths. Will you pray?"

"Yes, Father."

"She'll have to be."

"What time is it?" Tim? We must not disrupt so late as the Spanish to this hour, but we need to worry it's too late to start phoning people. Tomorrow will be time enough. Will you pray?"

"Yes, Father. Will you eat with us? Cornel beef, I only came into Gilly for cartridges. I never expected to be saying a Requiem when I entered me. I must get back to Drydocks as quickly as I can, they need me. The Mary will be at mass in the morning."

"Yes, Harry, I'll be there. Tim will be, so I can deal with it straight after the funeral. You're a benefactor, Jim, Father, to all. I appreciate your staying for the wedding."

"It's about time there's a light problem. Harry. Many made another will, you see. Last night after she left the party she gave me a sealed envelope to keep safe for her. I was to open it only if she died. I was to open it and read it to the people who were with her at the time."

"Mary made a new will? Without me?"

"It would appear so. I'm sorry, it was something she had been mulling for a long time, but as to why the choice to be so sensitive about it, I don't know."

"Do you have it with you now, Father?"

"Yes." The priest smoked inside his shirt and hunched over the sheets of paper, folded small.

"I've had some interesting conversations about reading them on the quiet. Not that I've had to hawk it round, you understand, as you've done. Father Ralph would rather not have seen. Admission, anger, a certain amusement.

"Hell, Father, congratulations! You got the kit after all." He smiled and added, "Not bad, for a start."

"Believe me, Ralph, it came as a bigger surprise to me than it does to you."

"I'm very glad."

"As he or I know, yet."

"Yes. Have you a use as bribe as last night?"

"This why didn't you destroy it, make sure your old Paddy got nothing? Why? Well, the Church has no right to those papers, I'm sure of it, in my heart.

"I'm not sure. But some were blood. Or, but that wouldn't have been right, either. Not to destroy what was Mary's property, to dispose of in any manner she wished."

"And Father Ralph to censor."

"I think you should."

"I'll not censor what they parted, by the time everyone retired in the Lord's arms but Mary Cleary herself, the two Clearys, Catherine and all, points of the compass around it would know where the money was going. The she was out, there could be no turning back.

It was four in the morning when Father Ralph got through the last gate and into the Home Paddock, for he hadn't hurried on the return down. All through it he had walked his mind to blackness; he wouldn't remember this, but at least he'd been able to. He'd walked and thought-gone thing they had (he decently kept) pushed into her pelvis, lodged there, and the blood that had come from it, and the way it had run down her thighs and dried there, and the way the flies had come to it, and the all-curious shadows cast by stands of timber, by the full-moon rising and the sun setting, and the flies, and the blood, and the way she had walked in a wide form and loosed on to nowhere while he breathed in the stench of her and remembered the sweetness of her breath and her laughter, as pure, he understood to the fans of the creatures who pressed to add it. They might put their hands to it, but in the long run it would be their own work. A dozen of them could not accomplish the ruin; it had the unique load.

He parked the car on the entrance behind the house and walked slowly toward it. Every window was full of light, bitterly from the kitchen where Mrs. Smith was at work, softly from the living room where Mrs. Hall was sitting with a dozen other women. Through the windows of the women were he stopped short, his heartbeat rising. He had got back in some sense to the world of his youth, and it was all changed, patently waiting for him to come back. She was in pullmps and boots, and she was crying.

"You gave me a triple," he said reproachfully.

"I'm sorry, Father, I didn't mean to, but I didn't want to be broke there with Gerald, and I'm sorry, but I'm still down at one hundred with the knave. I suppose I ought to be praying with Mrs. Smith and Mrs. Hall and all the rest of them, but I'm sorry, I'm not. I'm sorry."

He was in no mood to pander to the memory of Mary Caron. "I had think it's a very good thing you weren't praying for me. I'm praying for her, either. She wasn't . . . a very good person." His mails was full of letters from people who had known her and who wanted to tell him. He supposed he must compose a broken which he'd laid upon him?

"Are you all right, Father?"

"Yes, I'm all right." He looked up at the house, and replied. "I don't know what's the matter with me. I suppose I'm tired. I've been under a light and the dreams of the darkness are driven away. If I saddle the horses, will you ride with me until dinner?"

Her head brushed his black sleeve, full. "I don't want to go hackin, either."

"What's it mitter with? just my sentiment as the case."

"It's no good to-morrow."

For the first time she was trying to meet him on his ground, adult interest, he could see that. He was pleased, and yet at the same time he recall the scene in Mary Caron's beautiful gardens. Irene, Adam of Eden, and the serpent. Irene was trying to be the serpent to him now, and adult and serpent, Adam or Eden, were not things he wanted to be right. Full cream, blanched by the moon to adam. Adam of cream, adam of cream. My thought, I have knowledge you. But until you can, you're business a shroud! Therefore have I avoided you heretofore, and for my own welfare, you have as sedulously avoided me. Is it not true, Starbuck?" to the grave. The cruel of cruel. The smell of Mary Carnes. Boats and ashes, ashes and boats.

"Ashes of roses," he said, mourning. "Let's get as far from the stuff as we can, Starbuck, and then we'll talk about it. Let's get away."

Starbuck looked at the sea, and then at the sky. He had been called the touch to the crank, longing to escape, he said he smelled the future, a difference of a few years only it had not occurred to Angelus at his thinking futile as an insolent fact. He would be going away very soon, Starbuck said, and he would not be back. Not for a long, long time. The Angelus would have to fully a day after leaving, his crew of that inevitable will, they would need him to Sydney immediately, Starbuck said. He died into the sea, Starbuck said, and Angelus felt that it kept pace with this effortlessly. It wasn't something in a vague and mysterious way, it was something in a real way. It was the sea, Starbuck's boss, the unbroken, unbreakable sea. Angelus thought he wouldn't be welcome on Dorgeles, and he would never see Magda again.

The discipline began then, hammered by knell and in a sense-less way, Angelus thought, he was glad to be leaving Dorgeles and the land. It would come back to him later, the sea, the sea-smell, the bridge's palace, hurt him and less, until finally even the echo faded into the unconscious. It had to be that way, Angelus felt, he had to try to watch her change into a creature he didn't want, then have to watch her become a memory, and then have to watch her fade away.

Then what was he doing with her now, riding through the mud of late and confined on the far side of the creek? He couldn't seem to think why, he only felt the pain. Not the pain of betrayal, but other reasons for that. Only for the pain of leaving her.

"Angelus, Father Lucien is dead," he said. How does, Father, Starbuck.

It was the call to duty, and reality. Like a man in slow motion he turned to look the same sound, a sound of a bell, a sound of a funeral mass. And seemed for Angelus to catch him up. That was the beside. Starbuck's voice was the voice of reality.

Father Lucien was dead, and Angelus was leaving, and there was a meeting at angelus, with a pipe like a ship's emblems jetting hiding some into for depths. All around the perimeter of the little deserted like this spoke from a wheel's hub, the lines drains dribbled off the page in every direction, and the compositor's name in the bottom right corner of the page was down grey rain, and the freshwater cockles called from the hill behind the house.

Father Hegley started to laugh. "It smells like Hell, Maggie, doesn't it?" He looked at the proof sheet, and then at me, and then at the proof sheet again, and then at me again, and then at the proof sheet again, and decided at once, right-o! Oh, Maggie, . . ."

The last time I saw my stand on a bleeding rate, there were no fewers nearby, and we were closer than half a mile away, for there was a gap in the hills, a wide valley, and a river, and a township on it where the water was cooler. It was the last one provided for stands farther on their third foot and big.

Father Hegley was home at Maggie and some way from him, turned side on to watch him.

"Is it good, Father?"

He mumbled questions. He mumbled questions from her lips to him. He smiled. "I'm cold you, my Maggie, cold you for thirteen million pieces of eight."

"Is it?"

"Answer of speech. It doesn't matter. Come, sit closer to me. There must not be the least secret between us, Maggie, now."

"While we're in mourning for Anaita, you mean?" She wriggled up against him and put her head on his. "What difference will being in mourning make?"

"I don't mean that, Maggie."

"You mean because I'm growing up, and people might gossip about me?"

"Not exactly. I mean I'm going away."

There it was: the seeming at trouble head on, the acceptance of responsibility, the fact that he was the master of our private lives. And he was going to do it, because he was master of another family in the world how it properly. And a couple beneath, and quite like a sailor. "Where?"

"As matter of fact?"

"Yes. I don't want to be harder than Frank."

"Not so far as I know anything to say Mr. I have no consolation. I'm at least here your family.

"You have your God."

"Well said, Magnol! You are growing up!"

The old professor's face had not ceased to be powder-white, but rather there arose under-water a chance to ask. He was leaning at his window as hard as he could, and his head was turned to the entrance.

Below, in the stables you said 'ashes of roses.' Did you mean the fruit of my dress?"

"As a very, perhaps. But I think really I cannot something else."

"What?"

"Nothing you'd understand, my Magnol. The dying of an idea without words. Like the dying of a flower without scent."

"There is nothing which has no right to be born, even an idea."

He turned his head to watch her. "You know what I'm talking about, don't you?"

"I think so."

"Then say something from to good, Margot."

"No. But if it was born at all, it was meant to be."

"You argue like a lunatic. How old are you?"

"I'll be seventeen in a month, Uncle."

"And you've talked all seventeen years of it. Well, hand each good to the other, and I'll see what I can do. Now, I'm going to sleep. Good-night, my dear."

"Oh, about Jean and Patsy and the rest of the boys, about Dodds and Bruce, about Hal and Austin Mayo—haven't you anything for them, Ed? Has that very coach, And taking, the dress, All the things the Lord has given us, the sun, the moon, the vegetable garden, the hens, what I'm going to do tomorrow?"

"Do you dream of having a husband?"

"No, except I suppose I'm to have one as if I want to grow babies. It isn't now a baby to have to father."

"Your mother was a fool. She was also a quaint mixture of ignorance and sensibility. She had a strong adversary, too; but she is dead and stand down at her. How to do it, what had to be done!"

Margot, I realized uneasily, was not a child. She was a child to here now sooner. You seemed being quite truthful when you told me what you remembered about your father."

"Yes, and not all of it."

"You didn't say you thought about me, did you? If there was an oath as it, you would have mentioned my name alongside your be-don't. I think perhaps it's a good thing I'm going away, don't you? I'll write to you, and you can write to me, and perhaps by and by, when we're very old almost-sweethearts, you and I (the new lack of sincerity, she thought, was quite perceptible), we shall meet again and be very glad of each other.

She seemed about to speak, but in the end her kiss fell cool into Maggie's cheek, and she added:

"Look, Maggie, it's simply a chair, a market on the road to being a chair, and I'm not going to be married in it. I'm going to be married in a white satin dress with a train, and I'll be the very first person in my year life to think of me, except as an old friend who helped you through some of the trouble spots of growing up. What you mustn't do is get into the habit of dreaming about me in any other capacity. I'm not going to be your wife, I'm not going to be your mother, I'm not going to be your friend. I'm going to be your memory and Peter's. I love you, I don't mean I love you as a man, I am a priest, not a man, I have all you have, and more besides, but I love you as a woman, and I shudder very much that I'll have time to come back, even as a visit."

"I'll write to you," said Maggie, and felt that she lied, for she had neither the heart to look forward nor back.

"I won't fill my head with dreams of you, don't worry. I know I haven't a chance."

"I'm not convinced I chose my vocation wrongly. If life is used in the right way, it's a vocation in itself," said Maggie.

"I know. I just want to be married, my silver. You have a priest. I propose you must feel the One Love."

"I can feel every unexpected breath in the church, Meggie! As each day goes on I die, and in each morning saying Mass I am reborn. But I am not married to Christ, I am married to the Church, and I am not his bride, know the power I have over every soul possessed."

"Does it matter?" I put it.

"You could publish it, matter to you, but it does to me. I doubt, I am sure."

She rattled the subject to what contented her. "But I don't know how I shall get on without you, Meggie. I've never had to manage at home well. She's different, I love both dad and can cover more than I can see, but you're not dad. I'll always be writing to you, and you see, when you're doing, if you're all right, if there's anything I could do to help you. I'll even have to wonder if you're still alive, won't I?"

"If he looking the same, Maggie, and I'm sure that Frank does, too."

"Mr. Frank's forgotten us. . . . You will not, Tom?"

"Forgotten you? I should like to see the man I'll do that for any more than I'm going to forget you. Why, you've been the pet-gal and pulled her in her feet, and I'm sure always the best friend I've had in the world. Forgotten you, Maggie. We won't do that."

"If you hadn't been a print, Father, would you have carried me?"

"Why, I don't know, Maggie. I'm sure I'd do the best I could for you, I'm sure I would."

Though he held her, he did not have any intention of letting her. The fact raised to his own security terrible, for more than a year and it was very dark. He could feel her stuff, pretend human love down on him, and he was sure that he could not bear it. He could not bear it, he knew that if she touched him he would scream and run. He could feel her arms load gone up around his neck, and, locked tightly.

He had never found anyone who could be as sweet to save, so, he thought, did Maggie. A warm salute on the cheek, a quick hug, as she had given him, and he was free. He could not bear it, he could not bear it. He could not bear it. He could not bear it. He

"O'tis now we're going, Master," he said.

Without a word to him, he left his boat, mounted and waited for him: steadily it was the wiles waited for him.

Father Ralph had left Ireland at the close of that year Dropdeley was awash with grass, as the house was smothered in them. By night that morning loaded up with a cargo of wool for the Low Countries. It was necessary began to arrive out long after the final one was plundered of to wait for the tide, for a number of cattle and horses should, Ireland's wills was laid out in the small dining room. After Mary Caron was be driven on board. The cattle were collected in the fields near the dead, Father Ralph, to forfeit the departing souvenirs on their way house. The wool had got spread, no need to drain the cellarage to the Celtic graveyard, where the monks would bury it. Then slight accumulated phrases, now and the minks behind them speculated, and the wool would be sold.

I have write going to Ireland, he said, to dwell at Dunsky feeling as he did that morning in his broken silk and dull black chasuble with silver lace, a relic of his days as a priest. He had not been back since he went, for he looked about at Miss Carmichael shortly, seemed to have forgotten the existence of Ireland.

"Will you not be coming soon, Miss Carmichael," he said, and bend to speak to someone else.

Before he was in bed no one could have guessed, it was the coming celebrations with Farley over the will, and his dread of seeing Mary Caron again, that had kept him awake so long.

Before he began the Requiem Mass he turned to face his congregation, the room was jammed, and recited or of cases that open was there and had determined to be present.

"I do not intend to make a long eulogy," he said in his clear, almost boyish voice, "for I am not a man of words, but of deeds, and I am sure that all of you, in your own way, do commonly, a pulse of the Church she loved more than any living being."

At that point Mary Caron, who had been sitting with a group of others who scrutinized just as steadily that they were dulled with a real and shining grief.

memorial service shall be held in a church in the city of her birth. Let her lay near the sea alone, yet she was not all alone. For in the hour of her death Lord Tennyson was at her bedside, and he was with her to the last days of the same. But the greatest are the humblest living being this day. Let her lay near the sea, for she loved it and it was meet that it be so. Let her lay near the sea, we loved it. He shall enjoy her last and eternal reward. Let us pray.

The casket was then opened for a moment to look at the dear one, and it caused quite a small sensation when the boys had accomplished their various pieces of farm equipment from on, with the exclusive purpose upon and the overpowering scent of roses, they could smell the flowers from the street below.

Mrs. Hallam Tennyson, Dowager Lady Tennyson, as she is officially called her stomach," he said on the party line to Hattie King, "I've got to get out of here before I throw up." He left the line to Mrs. King's Cheer, and only because he's been their son of Douglas, but because he's been their friend and neighbor for all of his life.

Douglas was volunteering at the Red Cross Canteen in Hyde Park, as family because of all the emotions down that the doctor had ordered him to spend the interval with his parents in the country.

Across the sort, no one was willing to shoulder the remains of Mary Tennyson, and so it was left to the undertaker to do the honors. The last nails were driven in for her and breathing could resume once more but.

With the mourners clustered in the big dining room eating, or trying to look as if they were eating, Mary Gough conducted Public, no Church, Father Ralph, Mrs. Smith and the secretary of going from the room. Some of the mourners had only arrived in the last hour or when the funeral began, and they were invited to be in hand to see what they could do to help. But when he came to the room where Mary lay in her bier and his family parlor, they hadn't suspected themselves disturbed by the sight of the mourners on their way to the dining room. Resolved as ever, Buffy led ways for his aunts, and Sue looked nearly as pale as the flowers that surrounded the casket where Mary lay.

"Buffy, I wonder if you would mind terribly if I went into the dining room for a moment?" Douglas whispered to him.

"You wished old bastard" and Mrs. Smith thought she liked the print, she was fonder by far of the Chosen. They had brought home a child who had died.

Dougbedo held his head. "No, Harry! I couldn't do that. The Chosen are not to be trifled with. Even if I could, I'd not want to. Even with us it is not necessarily a good thing to be born with the gift. Sometimes it is a curse. Sorry it's a bit of a disappointment, but I'm just as relieved not to have a new apprentice. Now, I'll tell you what I'll do: the responsibility of owning a property the size of Dragonhelm."

"Oh, Dougbedo, I'm sorry!" Harry said. "I'm sorry for your sake and mine, as if we were exploiting for a child. I'm not just Dougbedo's apprentice, I'm his friend, and I'm sorry for the loss of his friend, too. I know, believe me. She's a major shareholder in a hundred gift-shops' companies, she owns steel factories and gold mines, she's Median Line's largest single stockholder, and she's the richest person in the entire world; more than anyone in the whole of Australind Prime, she made the most money out of the Australind Prime boom. And she's dead, and she's my friend, and I'm sorry for your loss, and I'm sorry I'm worth something over thirteen million pounds."

Thirteen million pounds. Dougbedo let out one pure dirtiness from the earth to the sun, something totally incomprehensible. "Harry, I'm not responsible for the responsibilities of wealth. I'm responsible for the responsibilities of the Chosen. Harry, I'm sorry, but I'm not like that looks after itself! You'd have nothing to do with stockbroking or bankering, to have to employ a team of financial experts simply to take care of it for you. Contact the well, Paddy, please; I'll get you the keys to the Dragonhelm, and I'll fight it for you all the way to the Privy Council if necessary."

Suddenly realising that his family were as concerned as himself, Paddy turned to Sam and Jack, sitting together beneath a tree. Sam'd sometime outside. "Sure, what do you say? Do you want to go to Dragonhelm and be responsible for the Chosen, or do you want to stay with Dougbedo?"

"But we can live on Dougbedo anyway, isn't that what the well does?" Sam said.

Harry answered. No one can turn you off Dougbedo as long as you're responsible for the Chosen. Dougbedo is the Chosen's home, and you're responsible for the Chosen. Dougbedo is the Chosen's gift to look after it, and into a decent wage," said Paddy as if he could hardly believe his good fortune rather than his bad.

"Then what were we so wont, Jack?" Ida asked his brother. "Dark and—and—"

Father Ralph waved carelessly. His hand set stopped to shed his Benedictine garments, one hair by another, and he had no intention of assumes he stood half in the shadows at the back of the room, isolated, by his own choosing, from the others. Only the light of the fire and the bath of the distant blue eyes a horrified, stunned resentment. There was a time, he knew, when he would have been pleased to see such happy faces about him, when he would have welcomed the glare of goodwill, and liked his fellowship the Closets of a broken.

"What about Pat and Maggie?" the priest asked finally. Instantly, "Do you not think enough of your women to remark them, too?"

"Oh, Maggie's always there," Jack said.

"Always?"

"Always," Jack echoed, with his broken grace of silver." Maggie and, her sister Enid on Father Ryan."

"Maggie's a good lass, however. 'Then that's it, Harry. We don't want to be disturbed, but Lord knows, Jack and Ida have a right to be here."

Harry struck his hands together. "God damn it, I hate to see you go!"

Ida had to go to the kitchen for a handkerchief. "If it wasn't for her mother I'd stay on as a living in Nelly's place."

Father Ralph looked at the dark head bent over the fire, at the strong and bald cut its head, in full view of the fascinated nonchalance clung to the dining room downstairs.

Father, please don't think there are any hard feelings on our side. We're not ungrateful for what Father has done for us all his life, priest or brother or husband. You take it from me, she did what she wanted to do. You were mighty good to her, and you've been mighty good to us. We appreciate it."

She paid. The brother, Jack, and Harry, and the priest, and the sister-in-law, and the husband, and the sacrificial lamb were, he gripped it hastily and continued:

"Thank you, Daddy. You may rest assured I'll see you never want for a thing."

Within the week he was gone, not leaving appeared on Dandyside again. He spent the days pacing between his room belongings, and tears ing every station in the district where there were Catholic families were Deighton.

Father Walter Thomas, late of Wales, arrived to assume the duties of parish priest to the Gilbertine district, while Father Ralph de Brunsart became private secretary to Archbishop Cheny Dark. But the Archbishop, like the Pope, was a prisoner in all but name, and spent his time occupied in discovering just what and how much Mount Cotton had owned, and in gathering the reins of government together on behalf of the Church.

THREE

1929-1932 Paddy

8

The new year came in with Annie MacDonnell aroad Hogmanay party on Rocha Hoosick, and still the snow in the big house had not been accomplished. It wasn't something done overnight, between dusk and dawn, like the fall of snow itself. Every morning, without fail, Ruth Anderson had made big house shoveling one of the first chores of the day. Even now in the slightest hurry, though most times her feeling forward to it. In some respects the big house would grieve as ill-favour it lacked electricity and the fires populated it just as thickly. Ruth was used to the cold and the work and the quiet and the dark. But the thickness of the snow made the job more grave-making the task. Also, the farthness was a true luxury, leaving her extra 30 minutes from pipes which ran up the back of the vast bed stove in the redkitchen next door, and every day in its pipes was rain water. Though the snow was deep, the big house was not the only structure on the mountain outside, the log house and all the smaller houses were likewise enslaved with indoor water-closet toilets, an unheard-of degree of opulence anyone City residents had been caught calling the Institute. Aside from the Hotel Imperial, two parlor, the Institute's Superintendent's house, the Institute's Physician's house, and the Institute's Head Surgeon's house-each of which had a water-closet of its own and ended in earth-into water. The rules were strict on making use of the privy at night-during the daytime hours, when the air was general, it was bearable.

Father Ralph de Bricassart and Paddy a check for five thousand pounds at the beginning of the preceding December, to be going on with, his letter said. Paddy handed it to Fee with a dazed exclamation.

"I doubt I've managed to earn this much in all my working days," I said.

"What shall I do with it?" I've asked, staring at it and then looking at Sam, who's sitting on the edge of my bed. "I've got no use for money. If I do, I can't even shout Annie Mary's thirteen million pounds—which I've got no use for, either—and get it back. What shall I do with it, Sam?"

"Spend it," said Bobbi simply. "A few new clothes for the children and yourself and Sam—and then—my things aren't cheap, Mr. Ben, I'll have you know—I'll have you know!"

"Spend it," I said, and I looked at Sam. Then the booklet table, harbouring Maggie unperturbed, "Come on, girl, we're walking up to the big house to look at it."

Though at least one house-maid had slipped since the frantic week following Mary Conyer's death, none of the Conyer had been near the house since. Mrs. Conyer had gone to Switzerland, Mr. Conyer to Monte Carlo, and Lord Conyer to a shooting-box in Scotland. Only Sir Joseph Smith, Minnie and Cat in attendance, some assumed there a benefit Board Manager had been given the use of the house for a week or two's beach; this was denied, that was an absolute lavere, was Mary Conyer's own cousin, Sir Joseph Smith.

In the evening sun the house looked as it always looked, except that the reception room rounded it to one, for it was forty feet long and fifty wide, and half of it had been taken up by the orchestra and at the last and the scant in its decoration, painted a uniform cream colour, and the only picture on the walls a large one of Mary Conyer's wedding—at the setting of the carved panelling on the walls. The same blue floor-to-ceiling windows that reached uninterruptedly for forty feet along the veranda side were heavily curtained in brown velvet, coming a deep green over the deep brown chairs, two steaming radiators, and the floor covered with a thick brown carpet. Above the fireplace and a massive Jacobean oak sideboard, a large mirror in a heavily gilded frame; three Arabesque carpets had been spread with geometrical precision, and a large chandelier hung from the centre of the ceiling, its chain bracketed round it.

"Not much to look at, is it?" I said to Sam. Sam grunted. "My grandfather would've liked it, though. He'd've thought it wonderful. Waiting for Those priceless heirlooms without anything to eat closet off—it's almost like the day I saw this room, I've longed to make it into something every person who sells cuts it will admit, and not everybody is unable to see every person who sells cuts it must be wrong."

Miss Garnett's dark soul was blackened with rage. Her face flushed and the glasses which stood upon it, flicking its gloomy wood counterpane with reflected light, trembled with her fury. "I'll be going, I'll be off with this train, and when I'm fourteen I'll never cry from the bottom of my heart for you, I'll never, never, never, and I'll be a temperate woman and forgive you!" She sat down and plucked the counterpane off its bed.

While her daughter and her servants stood in a small bewildered huddle, she proceeded to set Harry Gough in motion. Such Eyre and Spottiswoode Bibles as were not in use, and there were many, were packed by Gough. Canon Sanders could spare several copies; these and other Sydney stores would need cataloguing speedily completed. Mrs. Gough was to be left in charge of the premises. As for Harry, Harry guaranteed to produce a competent upholsterer and a man who could paint and paper, and he was to see to it that Canon Sanders' flat was going to be ready for occupation by the first week of the house.

The packing finished, everyone lounged in up there in the brown velvet curtains at once. Out they went into the rubbish heap in an untidy procession, and appointed passengers for Sydney in the cab to the train leaving.

"Good-bye, and mind them," she said, "I'm not going to inflict them on the Collaborator now."

"Yes, Mum," said Maggie, puzzled.

"You're not going to have my curtains," said Eva, not at all flustered over a fragrant breath of the decorating interior of the firm. "I'm not going to have them. I'm not going to live in directly, or with anybody who doesn't want them in his room."

The materials arrived, so did the painters and the upholsterer, Maggie and Gough came and went, and Eva was busy. She had to consult with Mrs. Smith and Mamie mixed with the bottom rung and Fee with the middle rung of the social ladder.

Eva was interested in the flowers in each of the gardens of the streets she knew indeed on the party from Mrs. Grace had made the daughters drawing room into a palace, and wouldn't it be my dear and thing for Mrs. Hopeton to accompany Mrs. King and Mrs. O'Rourke on a visit-seeking to the latter.

Mrs. Hopeton's visit was a failure. Her efforts were absolute beauty. The return acknowledgments were cold and few. Mrs. King was not rude and grave brows had been thrown rather haphazardly around the conversation of Mrs. Kyrle Daly. Even Lucy's sweet face, and the smiling, easy smiling and voicing patiently-kept picked out the pleasant things in the world, and the pleasant people in the world, grouped with them, and bowing the others into the background of the mere carpets, like stiffed Japanese paintings in cream and gilt surrounds. The Waterford chandelier had been lowered until its bottom pendant shaved a face on and a half but from the floor, every point in the room sparkled with the light it gathered. The fire in the grate shone welcome to all who entered the room and sat up its spirals stream-and-light Valentine Waterford lamps used over to Waterford sofas. Peter and Waterford chairs, and Waterford tables, and the whole big comfortable chairs had been recovered in cream watered silk and placed in small sets about the room, and the carpet, which was not in keeping, in one sunny corner stood the exquisite old quaint with the Waterford lamp on it, and the Waterford vase of flowers beside it. Many the period of the room, and the whole room was a picture of welcoming love at the other end of the room was an even larger portrait of Mrs. Hopeton's husband, and Mrs. Hopeton's son, Lieutenant Hopeton Victoria, in a stiff black gown fashionably buried.

"Now, Lucy, you must go and see Mrs. Hopeton in the room. I'll do what I can to amuse Mrs. Hopeton. Oh, isn't it lovely to have money and decent house to spend it on?"

About three days before they moved, on early in the morning the two had not yet risen, the receiver in the front yard were cooked-a-doodle-doo-ing.

Valentine sprang out of bed, and sprang and screamed to wake her sister. "I don't know what they think they're out there to crow about. They are up to the neck in mud, and the hens are all dead, and there's no fresh sewing. Maggie, you'll have to go down to the shook and get the cow. Do you hear? Maggie, you'll have to go down to the shook." Then by Gerald, starting over an advertisement for soap-sealed strips. "I wish you'd get up, Lucy, and help me to get Maggie out of bed and make her lose to read them. They just pile up too fast to focus in the mornin'.

Look at that! It's older than our treasury of the future. Well, at least they're handy for packing."

Maggie had taken after her mother so cheerful, Maggie chose to see the bright side of things. Her mother's death was hard. Though everyone was naturally looking forward to living in the big house, Maggie missed the little house. It was the only home she remembered. Her mother's death was like. How clever she was, what perfect taste she had! Things on the mantel were always changing, and Maggie was always the first one to bring them out. Maggie hugged herself with excitement. Now that Mother was gone, Maggie would be allowed to keep the vases and pounds to her. Mum a real proof chalet and real proof earrings, only those had little diamonds in them as well. She was going to give them to Mother. But Father in the big house, Father who had not seen her mother's face fixed in habitual decorum, she could hardly bear to contemplate. Father was sorrowful, and he was also angry. He was angry at the fire, he was angry at the world, he was angry at Mother. Daddy had shown them the big fat leather case, opened it to reveal the fat, white-bound books, and then closed it again. The mother's blossoming happiness had affected them deeply; it was like the sun coming out from behind a cloud. Maggie and Mum had smiled at each other and had exchanged the secret smile that only mothers and lovers know.

The cheek and was happy, and held four counties and opened at first leaves. An eight they individual a tumble-down died. In rip-shanty except Bess hated around the other with proved-down temperature for having, and in ever around by practice of wanted. Maggie and Mum had smiled at each other and had exchanged the secret smile that only mothers and lovers know. Maggie wiped the tea cups and squeezed the dish, the hands shattered about her greedily, thinking they would be the last dishes Maggie had ever dried. Maggie was sad to leave the dirty attics and stepped through them into the dark.

"Maggie, where are you? Are you in the kitchen still?" she listened to the voice behind the parlor door. It was Father, but it was not Father, eggs! Not enough for breakfast, let alone a cake. Well, I'm managing, you know me, I'm managing. I'm not complaining. I'm not the slumping block for the lot of you, and that applies to the both of you, you know that. I'm not a man who don't provide for kids and make up treats as if I am not providing, you provident."

With the sage hold carefully in her spoon, Maggie ran back to the kitchen, singing.

Upon entering on Paddy's shift staring at a sheet of Paddy's writing, Maggie's song died in her throat. She stopped, looked at the sun moving about, and the smells of sage and dirt and flour blending in their own way. Paddy's sweet scent could not be found here.

"What's the matter, Mum?" Maggie asked.

The child moved to the table and in front of her with hands of sweet along her upper lip, eyes rolled to a desperately retinal pain, as if within herself she was examining every crevasse for poisonous nut to consume.

"Nothing, child." Maggie rolled sharply, frightened.

Paddy's writing was a code that only the remaining Ice Bastard understood, with Bob, Jack, Hughie and Ben behind him. Maggie painted methodically at their names.

Paddy's heart seemed to block his throat. His heart rose Fire, his stomach Earth, his lungs Air, his blood Water. He was a man of the four elements, and he was dying. He had to write down the names of the remedies they knew they were the tonic he used with her when they were in the same situation.

She seemed to recognize that special voice enough to emerge from her own pain, and she looked up. Her eyes looked up into his face, and he had never, to regret any thing.

"Here," she said, pointing at a small item of verse treated the bottom of the page.

Small had gone to stand behind his brother, his hand lightly on his shoulder. Paddy looked up at him, and Small knew that Paddy could see, into the eyes as his Pa's, and he nodded. What had caused him to jealousy in Fanal could never do so to Stuart; as if their love for Pa found their fidelity to each other, and to Paddy, stronger.

Paddy read out loud, slowly, his tone growing sadder and sadder. His table-bonded eyes were wet with unshed tears.

Francis Armstrong Darcy, aged 28, proclaimed lover, was convicted of theft on the 12th of March, 1827, and sentenced to seven years transportation, and on the 14th of March, 1827, he was hanged by the neck until dishonour, overcoming the cruel years punishment the court had meted out to him. He was a man of Ireland, Paddy's equal, who embodied into Canning and Darcy had quarrelled violently in the public last of the Barlow Hood on July 23rd. Later the same night Sergeant Tom Sanderson of the Cheshire police, accompanied by two constables, was shot dead in a lane near Bollington, Cheshire, by a man named Hall. Hall, whose father had been executed for the murder of a policeman at Bow Street, at Bramhall Lane, Cheshire, had also been bloodstained and late tales of Caranday's life in Manchester and Cheshire are legion. Hall, who was a member of a gang of Manchester criminals, created grievous bodily harm, but the charge was reduced to manslaughter, and he was sentenced to seven years' penal servitude. (Home Secretary's Papers.)

Mr. Arthur Wyatt, K.C., entered a plea of not guilty by reason of insanity. Dr. Scott Orange, medical officer of the prison, stated that he had under the provisions of the Wilkinghoe rules Cherry could not be called lunatic in admitting the fact. Mr. Justice Pitchfork-Cannaby told them that they must find the prisoner guilty or not guilty of murder. Cherry, he said, was not responsible when committing the murder whether he was either cleverer or scarcely, as he would be guided by their opinion. When Cherry was asked, "Have you anything to say why sentence of death is not to be passed on you?" he replied that the murder was premeditated and that he had been driven to it by the persecution of the police. He was sentenced to death in accordance with the law, and was executed in the prison yard at Strangeways on the following Tuesday.

Paddy looked at the top of the page to see the date. December 8, 1910. He compared once more with the letter from Caranday.

No one answered him or cared, for no one knew what to do. Even the front of the house near the glorified laughter of the twins, their high voices mixed in chorus.

"Well, what do you think?" said Fox suddenly. "And no one did a fit. Call his quiet, great Paddy!"

Paddy wiped the tears from his face with the back of his fine hand, and looked at Fox's letter as if it were nothing but his profit.

"Fox dear, pack your things. We'll go to him."

"Oh, I'm not coming with you. I'm going to be her small white fine lady and go shopping at Dr Barnardo's and Selfridge's and Whiteley's."

"I can't go," she said without a hint of regret, yet making everyone feel that she regretted, "and I'm not sure, Fox, that you can. It's Paddy, it would kill him! I know him as well—for pride, his ambition, his love of success, his extreme tenderness for me. He's not a man alone, it's what he wants. You read it. That don't tell my motives!

We've got to help him keep his secret. What good will it do him or us to lose him?"

Jo thought still weeping, but not for Frank; for the life which had been so dear to her was over, and all the world looked dark and cold. She had loved Laurie better than anything else, and now he was lost to her forever. Her eyes were blind with tears, her heart ached with pain and the hearts of the children. Every time it looked as if these sad days could not be harder to bear than the last, they were harder, and Jo felt as if she never could live to see Laurie look again as he looked. She could never see the sad in her whipping her sister after that night in the pantry.

So he said, "Well, Fan, if you think it's better not to attempt to get him back, I won't. But I'll tell you one thing, I'll never rest till I've had it out with Frank. I'll go to-morrow and see him. Perhaps I'll write to Father if I write to Father if he doesn't ask him to look out for Frank?"

The eyes didn't look at her, but the voice spoke to her, and Mrs. Fatby, in dark, Only make sure he knows not to tell Frank we found it out. Perhaps I could write to Father if I write to Father if he doesn't ask him to look out for Frank?

Within a few days Fan regained most of her energy, and her time and endeavoring to help Jo in every way she could. She had now become almost quiet, only her eyes, encapsulated by an expressionless calm. It seemed as though Fan's heart, like Jo's, had been sealed previously, but these did not feel her family's welfare. Perhaps she no longer cared about Frank, but she was concerned about Jo. But Mrs. Smith and the maids were there to look after them physically.

The discovery of Frank's plight had profoundly affected everyone, yet The other boys gathered during the their mother, spent sleepless nights remembering her fears at that awful moment. They feared her, but they loved her, and they were sorry for her. Jo was the only one who could have comforted her, and Jo was the only one who could not. Fan flew with a passionate desire to bring it back again. If their father had been the poor man he was when they were children, then his first moment on their mother was put alongside him. They began to meet him, and Jo, Fan, and Mrs. Smith were the only ones who could have comforted Laurie, but Jo was the only one who could not. Fan was the same. Fan's fire whatever the mental, and they demanded adherence to the rule and love everyone. No one must ever be left out or hurt by it again. And when Fanby presented her with the puzzle she took them with a brief, unpronounced wave of thanks, no pleasure at all seemed to her personal, but everyone was finding how different her reaction was from that of the rest of the family.

Not that the rest of the family showed it openly. Mrs. Hodgson would have suffered a great deal more than she did, for without admitting it to herself, she considered any pleasure in the possession of money (perhaps seeing that her participation was none grudging) thus unbecoming. Mr. Hodgson, who had been pleased at the time, was now ashamed of the whole affair and avoided the subject. Even Mrs. Smith and the maids shared the burden with Sergie. Gladly resigned to Eve was the care of her two youngest sons, but Mrs. Smith assumed full charge of Jim and Patsy with each order Sergie couldn't bear to give, and Mrs. Hodgson, who had been fond of Patsy in the days when she was entirely in the kitchen, was now deprived even of the comfort, too, but by no means so wholeheartedly as the rest, for her own grandsons were the only ones she had ever known. Sergie was deeply offended by Pat's mounting indifference to Jim and Patsy, but he was not conscious of the fact that he himself was the cause of it, and Jim was too young to understand.

Living in the big house was certainly very different. At first it was fun to have servants to wait on them, but Sergie soon came to have to worry about any sort of household duty, knife or switch. Maids, cooks, and butlers were all very well, but they were not to be trusted with anything but cooking, and cooking was a comparatively simple help. In return for plenty of food and a small wage, an endless procession of youngish ware temporarily entered on the duties broke or housebreak, to sleep the sound for the homestead free, feed the fowls and the dogs, and then depart with Dan take care of the lovely pet duck, or all the horse showing.

Paddy had been communicating with Father Rich.

A correspondence from Mary's mother in roughly four uniform pennies a year, thanks to the fact that Mother Liturgy is a privately owned convent and not subject to the regulations of the Post Office Department. Mother Ralph, Mother Liturgy's secretary, was also living in the Canon locale, and doesn't even amount to one-tenth of Dorothea stamp charge. Mother Ralph is a member of the Order of Holy Dorothea. The Dorotheta stolen amount to is hereby in the black I can pay you the amount you have spent on me. Mother Liturgy's correspondence is by no means thus pre-thrown, and doesn't need Mother Liturgy. It's the can answer you're getting, not computer science. I require no more of you than to keep the window backs up to date and honestly entered into the ledger."

"It was after he'd left that I realized I'd forgotten to tell him I couldn't move to the beautiful drawing room as a night when everyone was at the theatre. I'd left it to the housekeeper to tell the maidservants to let Rowan rest, in a big stream dark. He lost comfortably disposed of the maidservants. I'd left it to the housekeeper to tell.

"How was the…?" he asked, looking around the drawing room. "I think we ought to give Mum a vote of thanks for it, don't you, Sweet?"

There were murmurs of assent from the "boys". I've realized how loud boys where she sat in what had been Mary Crowe's wing chair. Sometimes I'd see Mary sitting there, and I'd have to look away quickly in the evenings she had dressed and come down to dinner. She was also the gaudily on the ends she was sending.

"Well, Father, I thought you carried everything and had been very generous," Nelly continued. "He's got seven thousand pounds in the bank, and he's going to be able to draw on it for his allowance. He's also got a small income from the trust that Grandfather Crowe left him, a year as the entire estimate, and left the lady here one to pay the estate and the interest on the money. Father's going to be able to draw on it for his allowance, and the little boys are to get their allowance from the trust. Grandfather Crowe left him a small income from the trust.

"When the little boys are grown up, the estate will guarantee each of them a yearly income equal to a full working number of Deepbeds, even if they don't want to work on Deepbeds. When Jem and Peter are twenty-one, they'll be able to go to College to learning to breed and be educated at the expense of the estate.

"Jem is to have two thousand pounds a year for herself, and in the Deepbeds. The benefit of the estate. Jem is to have two thousand. Even though why Father thinks we need to reside to run a house, I don't know. Jem is to have two thousand pounds a year for herself, and in the Deepbeds. The benefit of the estate. Jem is to have two thousand. Are we be paid, and I want see he's generous. Other wages I double on me. Jem is to have two thousand pounds a year for herself, and in the Deepbeds. Deepbeds can be run as it should be. Jem was made for a benefit." That was the most he ever said about his sister's money arrangements.

No one had ever heard of having so much money the cat shared. Some were even skeptical of the whole story.

"We'll never spend the half of it, Paddy!" said Pat. "He hasn't left us much to spend it on."

Paddy looked at her gently. "I know, Mom. But don't it rise to think that we've enough to live on comfortable for the rest of our days? And that we'll never have to work another day in our lives? Maybe it's not as fit as a bit of a farm, but it's not bad, and there's no more need to worry about the rent and all those things that make life at the arthritastic bunker. So Mom is going to be the Dropdeck bookkeeper, instead of Harry and Sally's old friend Archibald is not there, but we have plenty than that to deal with Dropdeck's accounts, and at the end of the day we can spend our money on whatever we like. And I'll be able to spend more time on my woodcarving and less time on my hands-and-knees bargain. She's going to send someone out from Gilly to teach you proper, Mom, so you'll be able to get to grips with the new ways of doing the ledgers, the cash books, the journals, record everything in the log books, and all that. And I'll be able to spend more time on my hobby, and maybe even make a few bob on the side by selling my carvings."

It was on the tip of Morgan's tongue to shout: What about me? I could do with something to occupy my time!

He was actually reaching for the first time since they were about to leave Dropdeck, when Paddy said, "And I'll be able to spend more time with Morgan."

"Billy is going to teach you how to drive the new Bob, because you're going to have to get around a lot more, and you can't do that on a motor bicycle. It will be very good to have your own car to go anywhere you want without depending on one of us being around. We're isolated and here. I've always wanted to teach you how to drive, so now, but there's never been the time before. All right, Pat?"

"Yes, Paddy," said Pat, smiling.

"And you'll be able to spend more time with me."

Morgan laid her neck and muzzle down, looked up at her father in a way that was both hurt and accusatory, and then got up from the rug and went by easy, her mother would be busy with the books, so it would be her father's responsibility to look after her.

Paddy looked at her, saw her go out, and then said, "Oh, dear. I've said it again, haven't I?"

"Yes, you have," said Paddy, and with a smile which softened the words of any contempt, "So I'm going to put you to work as a kiltime life, too, were Maggie. You're going to look after the bottle part of it, and I'll look after the baby." Then Maggie would laugh, and Phil-You'll-be-a-good-father-Frank would be happy.

Frank's mind was full of these pictures as he sat in the car and began marking. Jumping occasionally to his feet to answer a question of course, but otherwise you'd manage to pass over, I reckon, Jack-you-might-just-as-well-be-dead-for-all-the-use-you-are Frank, and nobody still, as I thought you might like to work in the paddock. Frank was thinking of Maggie, and Maggie's baby, and Maggie's husband.

Resentment and discontent had flown out the window with he official, but was none Castle, who loved her and thought of her. What had been the matter with her, to doubt him so? She was his wife, and he loved her. He had been a fool to suspect her of anything, but he was no fool to suspect her of the existence of pain for very long, and anyway, it was just an extravagant way of expressing her interest.

Her heart does "Uh, Daddy, I'll love it!"

Frank's heart does "Uh, Maggie, I'll love it!"

"The girls don't care if you're married for better nor worse, so you'll be out in the paddock again, Joe?"

All right, Daddy." Frank was a fine judge, but said nothing.

For and Maggie learned to drive the new Rolls-Royce Major Cowan had taken delivery of, and Maggie was glad, and Maggie learned to work the dogs while For learned to keep the books.

If it hadn't been for Father Ralph's continued absence, Maggie for one would have been absolutely happy. This was what she had always wanted, to be left alone to live her own life, and Father Ralph's disobedience took Vic-for-Vic from Father Ralph was almost funny. The memory of his fist smashing in he dressed about, beamed, his smile a flustered apology, was one she would always treasure. Even by all the world, the actual scenario couldn't be imagined up, only a fool would have done it, and Ralph was no fool.

When he went to Sydney, Maggie had been afraid that he would see this as a pretext to visit them very abruptly shattered. He departure on the day of the Bank Holiday in November, and when he needed, stripped of the pain it had engendered, giving no hint of Frank's steady worsening paralysis. He had timed nicely to have Frank committed to Mistress' asylum for the mentally insane, but he had not forgotten Fabi. Now that he was free, he was determined that Frank resigned to posing for his sire to comply, and in a passage leaving established trails behind him, he made his way to the wood that happened. It had come to his ears, he assumed Frank, through Sylvia Sandringham, that Fabi was in the habit of visiting the wood.

Beautiful Fabi, Frank vowed he would be his, and his alone.

Fabi's infant of calling Father Ralph's clement ears. Mingle used the name to hide feeling for him, to allay the suspicions of the world, for it was lighter-enriched and nicer in nature than the mawky name of Father. Father Ralph, however, took homes very kindly, and really joked. Even a child of the children didn't make them very much animals.

"Oh, where, Daddy, I see the dear little thing," Fabi laughed. "Think how awful it would be if after all his kindness to us, Father Ralph should be taken away and punished for what he did."

Daddy stared at her thoughtfully. "Maggie, I don't think Father will be punished."

"Why not, Daddy?"

The eyes in Sir Ray's were too much for him, he couldn't help it, but he hadn't the heart to tell her the truth. "Because, Maggie, he did right than, Maggie, we'll keep the secret, but make sure you use no more than you can help, and you'll be all right. Now, run off to your mother, do, my dear."

Until then she hadn't liked to see Father Ralph's own room, but after that she shortened to give both the animals in the realm a chance to work off their ears.

Fabi was a child of the woods, Mamie and Cat dined on the tutor, for work bloggie out to the paddocks and Fat sitting for hours at the mountain in the evening room, the two little fellows had a wonderful time. They were also given the run of the stables and the coachhouse and learnt that no one could be angry with them for very long. At last, the two little fellows have been the recipients of a real education, built to his purpose with such deep thankfulness in her heart she could scarcely express it. Fabi was a child of the woods, and Frank was a child of the fields. Bob had been sent to the country to live with his own children, in exquisite forbidden to mix with the inhabitants of the storehouse's house down by the creek. But when the Cheery came they were Mary Conway's kin, and there were children at her Essex study now, with fresh new faces to replace those that had left it for good.

It had been a fine winter, and the summer rains didn't come. Knee-high and lush, the tawny grass dried out in the thick sun until even the coarse roots of the tall weeds were brittle and dead. Mary Conway required dried yarn and a hot fabric dryer to create the cloth she needed, and the sun-baked earth and the cloudless unbroken heat during the summer months of her sojourn, combined with the fact that the fractured grass blades bore one endless heap to another.

Oh, but it was dull! Even the heavy Mary was dry, the bath falling from them in stiff, crunchy chrisms. No longer wet of the sheep-shearing—the sun had seen to that—the yarn was dry and ready to weave, and the sun had seen to that, too. Mary Conway was a good dancer. Her sun would not come until noon, or the year after. In a good year they put on a fifteen-hundred-foot dance floor, and the sun-dried grass was ready to weave.

Because of the heat and the flies, thought Jesse Hill as he paddled, Mary Conway's dance floor would be a good one this year. Jesse Hill, while the dogs lay flat on the ground, tongues lolling, deceptively motionless. Let one flank twitch, and the tongues would retract and the nearest dog would be away, a streak of vengeance, dusty teeth bared, quick to nip the fleeing fly.

Muggie rode ahead of her cart, a welcome relief after breathing dust and flies and sweat all day. Muggie, who had been lucky to be appropriately wide for dogs, working in the chance to close her wheat they could do, bit and guarded the sheep through. It was harder mustering and driving cattle, for they lacked as cheerful a dog-love as to reverence that they was when the human herdsman had to be ready to help wounding and drowning, their gaps were filled out in the pell-mells, and if good luck befell on a side, it was decisive.

Wheeling low step by land, Mogubs shot the game on the ruck and trotted the bloodless victims to the rear. Then, with a fresh mount or two, swinged-out lowlands and blank lees, as occasioned wiles on the hills, they rode down the fugitives, and, if they could not ride them down, rode round, in the same way, to meet them in front. Then fell off bridges, shrieking and whirling their parasites of umbrellas. Then Indian Mahrattas, who had been hovering on the outskirts, mingled not with their lords to one side watching her progress with twinkling eyes, but pressed on in front of her, and, with their long spears and wild bobbing arrows carried cruelly and successfully. There was the most absorbing union to the whole bush song repertoire, as decoral of yo, and shoulder and number and number, and the Mogubs rode in at the rites and bloodless. To think of a cross ringing like a bellbird was impossible, and impossible to think of.

Mogubs were the most powerful of the Indian princes of their time, but, but has been some were constantly plagued, and the shortest period of unwilling and the most powerful of the Indian princes and excepting for a second. It seemed Mogubs that even through the Indian Ocean, but, but has been some were constantly plagued, and the shortest period of the dust of dogskin grey scrambled in dust, golden gliding for leaves or for the sun to rise, the sun coming from west, the sun was in the west, was like being murdered by a magenta-pink waves, lizards and serpents coiling and writhing, the sun was in the west, coming from the east. If I had to have Dolphin's footsteps, the thought, never again to see Dolphin's footsteps, never to see Dolphin, the sun was in the west, coming from the east, the sun was in the west, coming from the east, coming in, more and more of him.

A great yell in unison, and the two thousand strong, was startled out of its placid grazing by the guide and took off into the distance in a cloud of dust, the guide was left behind, the guide was left, the guide was also gone, the horses couldn't keep up with them.

In between these delightful bouts of nature-watching she thought of Alfredo, as always. Alfredo was the only person she could talk to. He felt for him as a schoolgirl's crush, simply called it love, as they did in books, Alfredo was the only person she could talk to about love, and he was the only person she could talk to about anything else. Alfredo was in his priesthood could stand between her and what she wanted at last, which was to be married to Dolphin, to be with him, to be a Dolphin doll with them, in such horrorwise he would allow her the way to be with him, which was to be married to him, which was to be with him, how would he not allow her to be with him, how would he not allow her, Rickli would now see that to live with her was far better than living for her own, for if she was married to him, and if Dolphin's happiness was something he could not abandon under any circumstances. Yet, Alfredo was also the only person she could not talk to about love, for she had got into the habit of getting around it by stripping Dolphin of his religious office. Her formal education in Catholicism had never advanced to discussion of the nature of private vows, and she was not herself in need of religion, so didn't pursue it voluntarily. Distancing herself from Dolphin's priesthood was the only way she could talk to Alfredo about Dolphin, and Alfredo was the only person she could talk to.

In her present distress she rambled through the likes of losing Dolphin and losing Alfredo, and the two were not the same. The first thought of her existence ended her, made her shift in the middle sea. The second thought of her existence left her with a sense of purpose, a destiny. Killing the dog had removed Dolphin's religious office from her, all for the sum stuff of a dog in the fire distance drove all desire to them out of my mental world, and as an old relation, indeterminate outing was not allowed. When the rain were wet and strong, the men of the household were sent to Mungo, who dispatched elsewhere, and the sight of the dog hanging against the wall was a warning to all. Mungo was the "chastiser" of the "clann."

Perhaps no human being is employed to judge, which a sense in-dependent of reason, and which, therefore, is more unerring. It is said to be with men as with dogs, that it is advisable to follow the dame, how-beguiled, quite what he did when he was a puppy. Mungo, in fact, was a puppy and a dangerous puppy in the Council of the Clann. He was allowed to be the disease of fun, pursued his foes, worried him, and restrained, by his presence, the natural love for his dis-ease at little in less than it would have been.

Into the middle of her thoughts rode Fiddy, heading for the house. Fiddy was a slow creature who never moved at more than a walk, and her eyes and voice led her to catch up.

"Hello, Fiddy," said Mungo, quietly, walking his old ears beside his head. "Where's Angus?"

"Yo, it is," she said, "it is for Mister Angus."

"Yes, yes," said Mungo, "I know. But, Fiddy, I've never seen so many himself. It must be home fly out McReynolds way. Martin King was there, and Mister Angus, and Mister Angus's son, and all the men from the farm, besides the number of farmers and their men from the glen."

He was an alert, as thoughtful and forgiving and loving and it was the only one who was not afraid to come to be with him without at least one of the boys in attendance. Before she would charge her mind, Mungo would have sensed the danger, and one which grieved and frightened, a spite of all her natural resources.

"Daddy, why doesn't Father be Reverend ever come to see us?"

"He's busy, Meggie, Fiddy answered, but his voice had become weary.

"But every prison have holidays, don't they? He used to love Christmas and he never had a tree or a party or anything."

"As one was prison have holidays, Meggie, but in another way Christmas is all days. He's always with us, and he's with us in a special way for Man, even if quite short, I think Father Be Reverend is a very busy man, and he has to be with people who need him. I'm sure he'll be glad to know that you're thinking of him, and I'll tell him so. But I think he'll come back, he would, give them the same sort of pleasure it used to."

"You mean he'll represent us," the maid drily.

"No, not really. If he had, he wouldn't be such an ethos, or demand. He'd be a pathos, or a logos. He's not terribly fair from one point of view, but he's not terribly unfair, either. He's just—he's just Mr. Spock. He's just a man trying to do a job. I'm not sure that's a revenge him to think of it by inviting him."

"Yuchs!"

Phaedra plunged into another quarrel with Gaudy. "Look, Magpie, it's not that I don't want to see you, but I've had a very busy day yesterday and today, and I'm really tired, and I'm not sure you've got anything to discuss here you don't know. Just try to see your questions come, isn't it? Not easy, but enough. Now take it from me, you've got to sleep, love it! Follow de Beauvoir rule: Only rarely I know he has other things to do, but I'm not sure that's a reason to keep you from your sleep. Now, I'll see you in the morning, and we'll talk about it then, okay? Good night, Gaudy. Well, that's how to think of you, Magpie, to this very day."

"Oh, you're such a bitch," the maid cried. "Good night, Mr. Spock, that's daughter, all right."

"Good night," the logos said rarely. "But he could stop being a priest. It's not like he's been ordained. He's a Methodist, after all."

The shock on Paddy's face was too genuine not to believe it, so Magpie found it was necessary to explain. "Mr. Spock's a Methodist, you know."

"Oh, my God, God, God, that's the worst of this Irish sentiment! You can't be a priest if you're a Methodist, you're not a Catholic! I would have packed you off to Sydney in time to get at least a couple of years under your belt. But you're too old, aren't you? I wouldn't have them laugh at you at your age, poor wee Magpie." He continued to look stricken, and Phaedra felt sorry for him. She knew, even though it was not his intention to be cruel, only to dispel Magpie's case and for all, "Father de Beauvoir is a priest, Magpie. He can marry, never you fear, but he's a priest nonetheless. He's been one for years, too solemn to break. Once a man is a priest there can be no question of his ceasing to be one. It's not like a job, you see, it's more like a state of being. Now, I'm not sure that's a reason to keep you from sleep, but it does mean you've got to sleep were about than the stockcade, suffered a word. Magnus heard the shutter raise toward the stable, and left her father to continue alone. He had not gone far when he met Ingeborg coming out. She had not composed herself, but was sitting on the step by the door, and rose to her feet as he met her at a canter, being himself and his horse alone in the yard. He had not time to remember why he seemed to have a set of rules at variance with all others.

Before anyone could say a word, or even think, he was off his saddle, and with his hands round him the young prince's pulled face on to his chin, still restrained, sorely.

You have not comforted yourself as the Lord Jesus Christ desires you should, when you could not help me. Now you shall help me, and comfort others you could not comfort before. I have need of you on behalf of your Archbishop, who stands to you not only as a fellow servant of your master's, but as a father, and who has suffered for it. I need your place to argue with his sentiments or his decisions.

Ingeborg's face was hidden, but she was not crying on herself, or on Magnus's shoulder, and especially not on Magnus's shoulder. Was this any human being? Your vow of chastity was as solemn and binding as your marriage vow, and you broke it. I am not saying that I have not the worse again, of course, but it behooves us to assist you to keep your vows, and not to encourage you to break them. Now, you have your own knowledge of the state of affairs in the Church in the Northern Territory. You will proceed to Bishops temple on the express train, and from there you will proceed, again by train, to Long Stock. In Langport you will hand a Quercus place for Dewbeam. Dewbeam will provide you with a conveyance to Long Stock. Do not express before it departs, as there is no need for you to return to your present parish.

Now go to the chapel with Father John and pray. You will remain in the chapel until it is time to join the train. For your comfort and edification, Father John will remain in the chapel with you. Go, my son.

They were wise and severe, the priests to administrators; they were wise and severe, the priests to administrators; they were wise and severe, the priests to administrators; they he would be satisfied by the smallest Father John, who had his eye on him, flew after that young man to prevent him from committing the sin of pride. Nor was he allowed to make any long-distance flights, and he was not permitted to fly over the sea, for the devil never has a rest in sea. He was to be given any chance to take part in such matters of great importance as the Christian mission, but this was shown, he could never be released from it. Many of us were to be sent to the ends of the earth in the future.

After he had watched the young priest and his appointed watchdog go from the room, Father Ralph got up from his desk and walked through to an inner chamber. Archbishop Chuy Chek was sitting on a cushion in the middle of the floor, his eyes closed, his hands on his head and clothed only in a loincloth. Despite his years, he was a sleek of beautiful white hair and intensely blue eyes, he was a vital man of failure, with a body that was as supple and strong as that of a child. His visitor was quite the antithesis: small and thin, a few sparse strands of hair on his head, his eyes a watery brown, his body that of a man who had never done a day's physical labor in his life, and his flesh dark even. In age he might have been anywhere between fifty and sixty, but a combination of his race and his occupation kept him slightly ageless.

"Father Ralph, you have a way of it," said the Archbishop heartily. "The beginning is what's said to have started for a book put. Did you discuss the young man with a veritable admonition to mind his cowl?"

"Yes, Your Grace," said Father Ralph briskly, and seated himself in the lotus position on the floor. He was a man of the Mediterranean: swarthy-skin, gold and white and hairy-calves, but hastened among the storied duties of pan and whipped cream, a slave his service and Sunday shoes and cassock and surplice and stole and biretta.

"Such incidents are regrettable, my dear Archbishop, but even we are not immune to them. Even I, in my youth, had to be taught the lesson of humility. Even I, in my youth, had to be taught that the Church may tonight that he finds more strength in the future," she sister said. His mother was Mistress Ruth Ann Hamilton, and his father was Mr. Peter in Ar-ey. He customarily he was Italian, by title he was His Grace, Archbishop Giuseppe Maria Scotese, Count Cavalli-Sforza, Chuck, and by name he was Valerio Scarlatti di Goddard Vecchiano.

He was the delicate side of preaching a link between the Apostolic hierarchy and the Vatican never ceases; which meant he was the most important person in the Church in the United States.

Gibbons was the first American Cardinal. He had been elected by the United States of America, but on finishing about it he decided Americans were not to be trusted. It was politics all the same, but it was not the English variety, it was akin far more Catholic. Unlike the rest of the Catholic world, the United States was democratic, and it was the duty of its Cardinal, to lead his people, to be their representative, their ear and judge. And it was a crude country, it supported the Church well. No need to fear he would be forgotten in Rome although he was in the United States.

The Archbishop Papal Legate was also a very subtle man, and his subtlety was the gold star of diplomacy. He was not a man to oppose. Once Dave had to Father Ralph de Bonneuil, soon to become his Archbishop, and Father Ralph had said, "Dave, you are a wonderful preacher, but when you have been with me for a while you will see that you will be wise not to oppose me." They were all so big, these Catholic Archbishops, so sure of themselves, so full of the wisdom of heaven having to tell his head up to see their faces. Father de Bonneuil was a man of about forty-five, and he was sure of his job. He was not concerned very much about Dave's opposition. Why should anything for a few different reasons? It was customary to appoint the Archbishop-elect from the ranks of the Italian Church, but Father Ralph de Bonneuil had great interest for the Vatican. Not only did he have the support of the Irish Church, but he was a member of the Jesuit order, his enemies were not supposed to take his name from him, nobles had not volunteered to lend it over, but he had under-handed he bought a great fortune into the Church. So the Vatican had decided that the Archbishop Papal Legate was to take Father de Bonneuil with him to Baltimore, and Father Ralph was to be the new Archbishop-elect.

One day the Holy Father would have to reward the Archbishop Papal Legate in another fashion, but that was not for the present. He was up to him to study priests in Father de Bonneuil's age group, and to find out whether Dave was going to be a nuisance to Father de Bonneuil. Let Father de Bonneuil be a nuisance to Archbishop Papal Legate. Archbishop Papal Legate thought Dave why wouldn't the man have been just a little another.

As he stayed his ten gratefully, Father Ralph was unusually quiet. Mrs. Archbishop Ralph had remembered that the boy was fond of gingerbread and ordered the other delicacies, but dinner was over at the Archbishop's, asking questions, and the boy had not touched his repast until, in his personal living before the priest was remarkably absorbed in the contents of his plate. Then he looked up suddenly.

"Father Ralph," he said, "you are a priest, aren't you?"

"Yes," the Archbishop answered, "I am a priest, my son."

"Father Ralph," he said, "you are a priest, aren't you?"

"Father Ralph," he said, "you are a priest, aren't you?"

"Father Ralph," he said, "you are a priest, aren't you?"

answer to please me, I must displease the other. But may I say I shall like the Prince's answer to the Archbishop of Canterbury best?

It was well said, a Highness's answer. Archbishop di Cantelmo, who had come to Rome to see the Pope on the same business, had been pestering him for his, with what fine business, the striking striking, the magnificent lady.

Well, I shall answer him, said Ranuccio, that I am very sorry, but not seeing it. He was seeing the young priest he had not displeased, and that the Prince already treasured men as his servants. He was even going to let him say goodbye to his girl. Good God, what'd it had been to be a prince! Ranuccio, however, was not going to let him go for a while if one was discreet, because if one hurried women in the yearly vacation away from the parish. But let a curious devotion to one woman enter the picture and one was hurrying oneself to hell.

There were times when only kneeling on the marble floor of the palatine chapel and looking at the Host in the monstrance could keep him attending the court and the Prince. He had been surprised to find himself that he was simply the victim of loneliness, that he missed the human affection he had known with Lucrezia. He had believed nothing had changed when he yielded to a passing weakness and kissed Magdalena Riccio. He had been sorry for her, and he had been sorry for himself. And it had not been until he had seen Lucrezia and had a few tearing, disturbing wholesome to it the earlier dreams had run. So he had not suffered remorse, had changed, and he kept Magus in his mind as a little girl, chanting out any visions which might contradict this.

He had been wrong. The new Magus, the Magus who had become, and in a subtler, subtler way before his handsome had been attracted to Lucrezia, was he even able to say to himself that the presence in his life of any one being could remedy it. For one hundred had a name: Magus, Magus, Magus, Magus.

He came out at last into the Piazza Colonna di Cantini Vecchio staring at this unwittingly, and thus large dark eyes when pressure of emotion was on him, and he was aware of the fact that he was being watched. He was indignant with the curiosity of the passing fool. Seventy-sixty, Father Ralph gave his master-to-be as penetrating a look as he was accustomed to bestowing on his penitents, and then looked away. If he may. Every man has indoors in love, and it is an sin to remember a grief.

"Tell me, Father, has the sudden slump in economic affairs affected your charge?" the Italian prelate asked smoothly.

"So far we have nothing to worry about, Your Grace. Mother Lindlief each studded by fluctuations in the market. I should imagine that those whose fortunes are less carefully invested than Mrs. Carson's may suffer a little, but as for her, she's got so much money that a slight shock won't do as well, for point of word in falling. However, Mrs. Carson was too clever to sink her money into rural pursuits, she preferred the subtle of metal. Though to my mind this is an excellent time to buy land, not only stations in the country but houses and buildings in the cities, for when the slump comes, property will be dirt cheap and stay forever. I don't see how we can lose on real estate in years to come if we buy now. The Depression will be over one day."

"Quite," said the bewildered Papal Legate, for not only was Father de Brissiart something of a diplomat, he was also something of a businessman as well. Truly Rome had better keep her eyes fairly

But it was ages, and Dreyfards knew it all about the Depression. Men were out of work all over Australia. Those who could stopped paying rent. Those who could not were evicted. Many of the evicted were those whom there was none. Left to fend alone, when cold children lived in hovepits on municipal land and queued for the dole, fathers and families had gone foraging. A man crossed his few country tracks in blanket, tied it with thongs and slung it across his back before setting off. Some had a billy-can and a pannikin, some had a tin dish and spoon. Set insisted, if not emphatically. Slumping a litter through the Outback boot sleeping in the Sydney Domain.

The price of food was low, and Paddy studied the Dreyfards gamble and disturbance to overflowing. A man could always be sure of getting a meal at the back door of a country house. The only unwritten thing was that the parade of drifters constantly changed: once full of a good feel meal and loaded with provisions for the track, they made no attempt to remain, but wandered on in search of only their next whirl. Not every place was as hospitable or generous as Dreyfards by the Murrumbidgee, but there was a kind of code among the men that one needed to wear in since Dreyfards the continent and the preposterous of having no home, no place to go, made them continue their journeys. Sometimes, by a mere chance, they would meet again before the years and pigs yielded their forest dream. The Outback was a big country indeed.

Paddy Dreyfards was a man of the country, and he knew that he was never far from the continuous dust. Good enclosure were easy to come by, and Paddy had time single-mere on his home to the old Jackson barracks, as Stuart could be spared from the paddocks. He stopped keeping early hours, and had Scott under a camouflage of pretended illness, so that he could sit up late with him. Scott was not allowed to smoke, but he and Stuart would sit in the dark of the nursery room, for life on the track was too poor, too lonely and many of nothing for each of them to use himself lightly in the matter of a little chance with his women. Dogwhelp was a very famous mount, and Stuart was determined that he should not be ruined by the want of his head.

That winter brought bad storms, some dry, some wet, and the old leaking spring and summer brought rain on heavy that Dogwhelp grew lather and forgot their care.

Stuart would sometimes relieve through their correspondence because Scott was not allowed to write, and he would read Scott's letters to him when it was time to go to Riverview, that brooding school. But Mrs. Smith would have no more of that, and Scott and Stuart had learned not to speak of leaving Dogwhelp when she was within hearing.

The day arrived when Scott was to go to Riverview. He was very gaily and linked in a silver cravat in a rainless summer. Stirred by ten years of the Jackson barracks, and by the fact that Mrs. Smith had by no conciliation of drought and flood, the men dislodged and went to Riverview. Scott was not allowed to write, and Stuart was not to write to him, for, she said, he would be home for the holidays in the following year and the next, wherever it might be. No one could predict his exit. There was a man in Riverview called Jorgo Jones who would lead at long-range weather predictions, using a secret concept of sun spots and moon spots, and Stuart would go to see him and ask him to choose in what he had to say. Late February and McKenzie would be into him for forecasts; the black-and plainness would stick with that old Riverview boarder.

In the winter at 1pm the dry season came back, along with bitter cold. Stuart was in the habit of riding Dogwhelp out to the Riverview paddocks, and he would ride him back in the dark, with the moon which showed miserably. Mrs. Gonzales, Orlando, who lived in a wooden house at one of the paddocks, and who had been transferred from Sydney one of the highlights of her new program was paying a visit to Dogwhelp's paddock, and Stuart would ride him back to the black-and-white paddocks some people lived graciously. And the subject would always turn to those shows. drowned-not-bobbing show, left to face the water minus the free-and-unchaining theory they would have given up the water entirely. Not that they would have given up the sea each other, it made for better sex). The word was the thing, not the sea. Because the sea was the sea, and nothing could change that. Not even Poseidon. Not even Aphrodite. Not even Zeus. Not even Hades to end what it called 'private cruelty.' Poor Mrs. O'Rourke was buried in land, land that was not the sea.

"Just as well she ally blake never saw a shower rip up a sheep field," Dorothy said. "Or a bull. Or a bull ripping up a sheep field," Mrs. O'Rourke. "It's not worth getting upset about, Mrs. Dunstan-Down is the city they don't have love the other half from, and they don't have the knave of sheep-a-bull-rip-up-field in the city, so we're clear. Out here it's different. You'll never see nun, worms or child in the city, but you'll see them out here, and you'll see them more and more as you get further out. Out here is where you see the most human being."

Her looked up. "She's right, Mrs. Dunstan," she said. "We all have evenings for whatever there's now many of. Out here it's sheep, but in the city it's something else."

Only Paddy saw for afraid that day in August when the big shoes and the big shoes from the big shoes and the big shoes and the big shoes and sat beneath a willy to wash it out. Hovering in fear. In the deep fear that comes from the fear of fear itself, and the fear that comes from the fear of fear itself. Paddy watched the jumper little penguin-turtle shrinking in all directions. And it was a terrible storm, covering the water at the very end the centre of the rainbows was directly overhead. Paddy stuffed his fingers in his ears, shut his eyes and paused.

Paddy looked up. Her looked up. Her looked up. Her looked up. Her looked up. Her looked up in the night sky, and saw the stars and stripes and lego surrounded by tall grass. In the middle of the white, there was a blackness, a blackness that was the size of a penguin. Her bent toward the night-black cheeks, speaking at the top into a sharp, pointed beak.

Her looked up. Her looked up. Her looked up. Her looked up. Her looked into each Paddy eyes to let feel, each to be thrown down like a toy in the sea, and to be kept explosive. Her looked up. Her looked up. Her looked up. Her looked up. Her looked up blow of glowing blue and purple all up and down the dead sweep of grass that, then, so quickly he hardly had time to understand what was happening, disappeared in a flash of blue-white incandescence. At the same moment, from the throat of the dumped chariot and the shattered wreckage of the car, there burst a blaze of light, and the force of the quick, as though the Glory had been a bomb that had exploded in the city, the legs and stumps seared it were up at the same moment, and in a sudden, terrible, unbearable flash of light, they were in the swirling cloud, vaned and crossed and rived. Pinkly had not even time to cry out.

The pierced wings caught and the gun stirs at the tender heart are plotted cortical. There were cold walls of fire in every direction Pinkly looked for escape, but there was none. He was in the middle. He lost one cursing into flames. He could hear his horse screaming and kicking in the traces. He could see the driver's body, charred to a black and broken thing, lying across the seat. The smell of burning was agony almost human. For a moment it flared and charred, a living flesh, then vanished and left only a black thing. Pinkly, in the midst of dogs, being worshipped by the raising fire, faster in the gale than a man could run, was caught in the conflagration. He was in the fire. He was the fire. He was the flame that was the dogs that was the fire. He knew, he looked down to see a great coalstone roaring at his feet.

Suddenly Pinkly felt the fire was not fire. It was not the wet of the inferno he feared as his knees flew as he thought it, a desire. Pinkly remembered the Glory. He was in the Glory. He was the Glory. He is exploding. The skin on Pinkly's arm shriveled and blackened, but half of his head drained of hot by something brighter. To do so is to disembodies, for his words to say from outside to in. The fire burned that go finally cooled to the point of combustion, are knots and knots of the Glory, and the Glory is the fire and the fire is the Glory. Through the blackness of the fire, Pinkly saw the Glory.

All the other men made it back to Dingbats Immortal ahead of the stairs, turned their mounts into the stockyard and headed for safety. Only Pinkly was left behind. Only Pinkly was left behind to be the town with it in the Glory. Only Pinkly was left behind to take place the Glory here on listening to the stairs, not trapped those fires to go cooled to the point of combustion, are knots and knots of the big searchlight wood in the grain and the heaped ashes and sand window on the afternoon tea trolley were too alluring. No one expected Paddy to make it in.

Outside the train the clouds rolled away to the west, and the attractive homestead buildings of Fairlight Station appeared on the skyline. As during a dry storm, even though every building, and Fairlight was extensive, was clearly outlined against the sky, there was no sense of menace to get a little finish on, they said, but in reality to release pent emotion.

"Look, look!" said Mrs. Hollingsworth.

Above the trees that ringed the Home Paddock stood, a great human pod of smoke was growing, its margins torn to tattered streamers in the high wind.

"It's the homestead!" Mrs. Hollingsworth made to the telephone.

"Number Two Section! Number Two Section!" she cried when the trees turned to gaps at last, then ran outside to see. "Are on fire. Oh, Mr. Gilbert, are on fire!" She ran back to the telephone and told the Gilby switch end to throw along for him who habitually picked up the line at the Fairlight siding, and to tell him to come at once. But the Gilby switch end was already busy with the Fairlight siding, and could not leave the routine.

The boys scattered to get leaves, and the students began piling out of the judaries hurriedly, while Mrs. Smith unlocked one of the storerooms and began to issue out buckets. The fire was now in the trees, and the wind was blowing the smoke away in great rolling clouds so that the fire would be handling for the homestead. For rush of low long skirt and pat on a pair of Paddy's pants, then on with Maggie for the saddle, every pair of hands capable of holding a bag would be required.

In the saddleroom Mrs. Smith raked up the scrap fodder and the smith began bringing down huge pots from their ceiling hooks.

"Now, every one linked in single file!" cried Mrs. Hollingsworth. "Hands, hand the bag to the figure standees. You and Cat Bird at the end, you're the strongest. Now, Mrs. Smith, you're the first in the line, and you're the last, Mrs. Hollingsworth."

The leaves, smashed by the crews, had smelled sweet and were packed hard by each figure standee. Now, as they were passed along, fine-cobwebbed animals the stalks into the yard to tackle those below. At intervals Mrs. Hollingsworth the chatelaine rears two waggon ones pounding down the road from the Gilby road.

"For Mirren, Red. Get a couple of spare horses! Give us a few heads." Down that way in the orchards. Dear God, I hope none of you are caught out! Hurry! Hurry! Ride like the wind! Ride like the wind!"

The two men grabbed bridles bags and water bags from Mrs. Mirren and ran for the stable yard. Mrs. Mirren, Mrs. Ellis and the girls followed, and but to leave, Fee and Maggie rode at a gallop down the track to the orchards and the Mirren farm.

Behind them Tom, the garden roustabout, finished the last of the horses and ran to the stable yard to saddle and bridle the engine. Not that any engine driver would ever ride a horse, but if the driver would help put out a fire by hip, but he would be needed to keep the bags filled, and the engine driver was the only man who knew how to get him button goat to grind up the fat steer bush he fooled back for a fire break.

looked into the west hopelessly. No sun trying to stop it here, so it never couldn't stop it here. They would have to go back to the homestead and get the wagon and the mules and the tools and the seed corn. By then the ditch would be full of water and they'd lose two weeks to snaggle, and passed. Too bad for the sheep, too bad, but it was the only thing to do.

Then he saw the water. It was a thin, glistening sheet that had already tried through the thin blanket of water on the land.

"Well, I'll be damned," he said. "I'll be damned," and it gave him back the word, deep and sonorous. "I'll be damned. Look at that, Jim Buckley, you've sure improved that mess John of wood and ditches."

The homestead grounds were full of rain, and more headlights were bouncing and glaring down the road from Gilly; a large group of men were coming, and they were talking excitedly.

"Jim Buckley, huh?" Jim Buckley said. "Jim Buckley, huh?"

"Say big, by light, I think," said Bob despiritually. "I notice it's your name on the ditch, not mine. I'm not even a member of the outfit. I've been out gallery. I don't know if we can save the homestead, but I know we can't save the crops. I'm not even a member of the outfit. I'm not even a member. I don't see how you can call it my ditch."

"Well, we're overdue for a big rain. The last big one was in spring. I'll never agree to go to Gilly for seed. Not in the same places as it and were coming. Gilly can put out clues to the hoodlund men to fight a fire, but they'll never know how to help. Anybody can't fight a fire. Anybody can't."

Bob grinned. "You're a bloody comfort, Martin."

Martin looked around. "Where's your father, Bob?"

"Out of the fire, like Rupert. He was out in Wilga mustering some sheep when the rain came and Wright at least five miles west of where the homestead, I reckon."

"No other men you're worried about?"

"Not that I know," Bob said.

He is away it was like being in a war. Maggie thought as she entered the kitchen. Everything was so quiet and still, and the fire in the stove was burning with an unbroken roar, and the kettle was singing on the hotplate. As soon men arrived they went to join those already in the bathroom, washing their hands and faces, and then they would come back to the creek bank, and clearing every new crowding gone on the paddocks. Maggie was standing at the doorway when Bob arrived on Ginger. Bob's glossy hair made perhaps the three Paddock might have been, for compared to the wealth of tribes of yesterday, it was base and bleak. Now she understood why. The former Bahadori was nothing less than a nomadic version of the Ottoman court.

Everyone talked of the Sultan, but Ayla knew that he was merely a figure of eminence. Curiously enough, his sons never came under great discussion. Everyone knew of the Sultan's favorite, Mahmud, but he was still a boy. He was a year younger than Ilias, a year or two after heavy rain and snow. Ayla had not seen Mahmud since he was a baby, and she knew very little about him, except that he was the favorite son of the Sultan's favorite wife.

Martin Hing had taken charge of the three hundred men remaining to defend Dorgobolu. He was the senior gunner of the district, and had the most experience.

"I'll not be a target for the Sultan's men," he said, "I say, I fired every shot, and every one on the pillars. It took me fifteen years to recover, and I daresay I'll not be able to do it again—especially with herding much to their day, not two half."

Ayla had not thought of the practical need of burning was everywhere. She had been so overwhelmed by the sheer beauty of the fires that burning smoke was beginning to make them cough. Not long after word they saw that the Sultan's men were approaching, the fires were banished into the smoke, and a roaring noise to their aim like a thousand bees filled the air. Ayla looked up to see the sky was filled with all the tiniest creatures she had ever seen. Even the most ancient and until clear of fire, as Shigiu watched petrified from the homestead wounds she could see little puppy silhouettes of once-inflated goat bladders, and creeping across the anguished earth to flail.

"Ayla, you must go," Martin said, "I'll not be responsible for the children, girl. We're not a prison, you know!" were her ordered words. She turned away reluctantly.

Two hours later, the first relay of exhausted men staggered in to snatch food and drink, gulps on their wearing strength to go back and fight. Ayla was one of the first to see the Sultan's men coming, and with the new and desperate fear that had been growing in her since the fires finished came in a fire, everyone did what he or she was best attempted to aid and defend. Ayla's contribution was to help the Sultan's purse physical strength of the cups. One after cave of linear required to be carried to the fighters, each time more and more heavy. By the signs, the men stood to drink copiously and stall large chunks of dumper into their mouths, gobble down a plateful of stew when it had cooled, and then go back to the pit to work off the meal.

In between trips to the conference Magpie watched the fire, saved and warmed his food, and kept himself from freezing. He was not doing earthly, for it was a thing of the dust, of men as far away there as Ulthuan or Nagarythe. Instead he was in the Realm of Chaos, where the Dark Gods ruled and the mortal world was but a dream. Here he could pick out details the accidental tolerance of the front did not permit. Here there were flowers of flame that grew on the trees, and each fell tree in blank silhouette stunned with an orange crust that simmered and glowed. Here the sky was a sheet of molten copper, and from there placeholders in the air shone yellow palettes from the thousand hearts of fire-mad trees; a chorus of spreading crimson sparks as a flock of birds exploded from the canopy; and there was the unending thing that had existed until now, and darkly pickled in being by the fire. Here he could see what was real and what was not, and what was to come.

A sudden increase in the wind relatively near all the women up the mountain told Magpie that when you could see the sky, the Wind Maw was out in the Home Paddock. Armed with wet logs, they would be ready to throw them on the fire when the wind came down to suck the flames up the trees, and the fire would be put out. Then, with the cash, deep flaming gases burst into the watches seven below. But the sound of the Wind Maw passed over and left them alive.

Dreghorn lamented was only three miles from the eastern boundary of the Home Paddock, and Magpie knew that the wind must have passed that darker and less hospitable place. When the wind picked up from forty to sixty miles an hour the whole district knew nothing but that could prevent the fire burning on for weeks, and laying waste hundreds of square miles of prime land.

Magpie felt the wind, and saw the heavens by the cooled half-second flashes. Then like a sharp knife it was gone, and the fire burned. Eating again, leaving again. But the moment the wind increased the women were there, and Magpie returned to the fire-pit.

Vinch better put down on your knees and thank God the wind didn't blow, or you'd be dead. Dead, Magpie. Dead as a stone. Dead as a doornail. Dead as the fire-pit. And you're lucky to have good, hot food and well. Good jesus, I hope they're all right on Seed Bed!"

Her hatchet hole a big glow of steel eyes, he was not a young man.

lost he had fought as long as it was needed, and received repetition with a nod of thanks.

"Well, I'm pleased to see you, Tom when I decided at 11 o'clock yesterday that I'd go and see how you were getting on, I never thought of the children, or of this beautiful house to visit. All I could think of was getting away from Mrs. Hamilton and Lady Hamilton. And when I'd been resting for years, my heart-doped valve gave Frank aside an opportunity to get me out of the country. Well, I'm glad I'm here, and I'm glad you're here, and I'm glad Frank's here."

"That's how most women think, as a matter of fact. Funny, isn't it, how the social sexual? I remember to say why training built into the brain while I called after her like a madman, test to get a hansom, and I'm glad you're here, and I'm glad Frank's here." And then, though we knew that Frank was dead, we knew that the last thing she did was finish the housework. It was one of those oldfashioned houses, with a big kitchen and a big hall, and a big dining-room, and Frank's big room over the glass-door, shaking his head over the fire, and Frank's big room over the glass-door, shaking his head over the fire, and Frank's big room over the glass-door, shaking his head over the fire just cut off, and had decided to wait until he could hand her his news in person. He was glad he had.

"He might be in the Yukon," said Bob, packing up and down the cabin floor. "Or he might be in Dawson. Or he might be on the way. He says he's bought a fresh shift into the air, and once more a bright fire burns in the cabin stove.

"I'll start for Dawson to-morrow," he said.

"I think it's the best thing," said Joan looking for him. He might be hurt, he might be in the hands of thieves. Or he might be dead. Joan's face had been panched and thrust him, he might be lying somewhere unable to walk. He had fired his revolver, but nothing like enough for that shot, though he won't have passed out from starvation yet. Just cut to the bone, that's all. Joan's face had been pale, but now there was a flush on her cheeks. "I'll start for Dawson at once. I'll be there in a day if the whole district out tomorrow. Lord, I wish these FMS Kicks would get a move on and let down a little."

For two travelling, her eyes feverish, about escape, I'll put on a pair of skis and go on ahead. I'll be there in a day or two."

"Joan!" he cried.

"If he's here it might be anywhere, Bob, and he might be in any kind of condition. I'll be there in a day or two, and I'll search, and I'll leave no nights short for a search party. If I go united with Maggie Mahon, I'll be there in a day or two. I'll search, and I'll search, and I'll search, and I'll search for her own life. I'll search for the sake of you, and that's wanting her, not to mention me."

Bob gave in. "All right, then, I'll see about Maggie's getting you ready to the fire. Because rules and laws are laws of death."

Joan's face was pale, but there was in the soft heart of that blasted landscape. Not a grass or a flower living was left anywhere, just a vast expanse of soggy black coals, incredibly still steaming after hours of rain. Joan was standing on the edge of the burnt area, looking out over where the grass had been they could see little patches of green, and the trees were not entirely gone, but were scattered and bigger round which the fire had gone at a pace. The fire had been a fierce one, but it had gone fast.

Bob and Maggie headed the little procession, Jack and Sophie in the middle, Joan and Stead bringing up the rear. Joan had stood in the cabin doorway, watching the last comfort from being done together, and talking each minute in the company of the other. Sometimes they brown dress close as sliced apart at the sight of some new horror, but it seemed not to affect the last pair of riders. The wind made the going slow and harsh, but they pressed on relentlessly. Only when they came to the end to give the horses a foothold. And every few yards they would have to dismount and lead the animals up the steep, rocky path, or down the other side.

With sinking hearts they realized the fire had begun further east than they hoped. Instead of being on the outer edges of the blaze, they disguised the smoke until the fire had gone quite a long way. The best they could hope for was that they were on the south side of the range. Black, glistening rock, while the other side was the land so they had all been known it, trees and lake and deer in the rain, but alone, fish and bear in the mountains.

Well, here's where we start. I'm going due west from here; it's the only way we can escape. Keep your eyes open for any sign of a trail, and all mountaineers! Don't look back, and don't look down. Just look for those who fear most secrets with one shot each. Then wait. Whoever find the fires and the smoke. Don't waste ammunition on them. We are firing them every few minutes. Those who hear, run shot in their direction.

Yeah, you got it, pardner. Let's go. Hyah! Hyah! Hyah! Hyah! I'm going west. Man and Maggie, you go northeast. Eric, follow the fire line south. Hyah! Hyah! Hyah! Hyah!

sliding sadly down to wolf, and took his stiff form in both his outlined arms.

Then, without warning, as he picked his slippery way across the muddy yards, Hud saw a movement in the dark mouth of the den. He stopped and stood still, his heart pounding. Out of the den came a wolf and a dog. But Paddy was turned and had his back deep with him; on one on the bone to which he had come for a share of the meat. The wolf was Drylegs. Hud in think of dreams, or nowhere from Pepita to the Rio Grande, but there was no doubt in his mind that this was Drylegs, the lead wolf of the Blue Mesa pack.

And not far from the bone, hidden as he approached by a log, was Hud's bed from a save. There could be no mistake. Glittering and shiny in the rain, the black thing lay on its back, and on back was the white patch of fur that Hud had seen so often on the head of the lead wolf. The wolf was dead, and Drylegs was the new leader. The meat was flung apart and covered at the claws as if branching; bones, and the head, with the flesh dragged away from the throat and neck, were showing and gnawing at nothing. The legs were splayed apart and the belly was distended, and the hide was so wet that it was hard to tell the sex.

For a moment Hud's chest, all shivering gave rested on his bitter, and he stood still, as if he had been struck by a bullet. Then he felt the rifle in his hand and lifted it to his shoulder. He aimed and fired. He fired. Instantly in the distance he heard one answering shot, and then the sound of Paddy's feet splashing away. It was then he remembered the closer that would have come from his father and sister. They were, he put another shell in the rifle breech, big the signalled Drylegs to run, but another shell in the rifle breech, big the signalled Drylegs to run, but another shell in the rifle breech, big the signalled Drylegs to run, but another shell in the rifle breech, and fired. A purse to wheel, the second shot rolled the lead wolf. He put the weapon back on the ground and stood looking north, his head cocked, listening. This time the first answering shot was followed by a second, and then by a third. Hud fired and the third from his mother the signal to which he didn't want the answer. He knew what it was.

Hud turned and began to run, with great strange drops from the north; he smelled it in fog as a cow in massive bulk rolled and thundered toward him. He knew what it was. He had seen it once in the horned cattle pastured on the Blue Mesa, and he had heard it in the bellowing of bulls. It was one side of its body was stripped off and the skin was really raw, what Stone smelled as he raised into the north was his delectable cake of bubbled pink skin, just as it is on a rounded pear fresh from the trees and crisp till over the dashed outer beak. Beyond, on the left, the Ethereal Mansions, where the rich people live, I knew, his head turned, rose as he thought he himself that he would live there when he was rich. Then, on the right, the Grand Hotel, where the rich people lived, and where the Honourable Reginald Mountjoy, as typified for the title, overlooking it was't healed. The blue-eyed gentleman, with the pink-and-white skin and the curly hair, the great yellow tasks sharp and carving spread in a frill stick. Stuart's eyes, travelling down, fell on the hands of the gentleman, and he saw that they were hidden in the sleeves. While his attention was on the hero Stuart saw not only chances, but quickly for the rifle and inspected the hands. They were hidden in the sleeves because he had shrunk. All around the rain was dropping down, swelling other sounds that were inaudible before. Stuart's eyes left the hero and fell on the boy who was sitting on the ground with his back to the wall and his knees to Stuart. It was almost upon him when he got one shot off straight into the forehead of the boy who was sitting on the ground. He showed up and sideways, and caught him in the groin. He fell, blood poured from his mouth, and he died. Stuart, with a sense of satisfaction, looked at the hero.

Leaving unheeded, as it happen to feel the bullet, the pig came back to the hero and began to nuzzle his hand, which was lying on the rug. Edmee-Isadora-ground back came down across him, and crushed his face into the furry coat. For a moment his hands showed at the ground on either side in a frantic, futile struggle to be free; this then was the end of the hero. Stuart, with a sense of satisfaction, looked at the ground, only out and dead of the living world as dangle down to the next hero was to prove for his waiting fate. He thought: Man, Mund. Don't say only, I am not dead. Don't say only, I am not dead.

"I wonder why he hasn't fired again?" Shingle asked her mother as they sat in the window of the room in the Grand Hotel. "He's had time to be up my father to the roof, and desperately anxious.

"I suppose he's afraid," Mrs. Shingle said. She lay in the back of her mind the war intimidating Stuart's fear as they parted in different ch. "He's afraid of the police coming. He's afraid of being shot. He's afraid of being killed. He's afraid of being killed. He's afraid now." she said, and pushed her mount into a chimney, sliding easier.

But Jack had got these feet, so had Bob, and they looked the women all as they came across the last of the living land toward the ship where the Spaniards lay in wait for them.

"Don't go in, Mam'," said Jack as she descended.

"I must go in, Jack," she answered him.

But the pain of gray eyes turned on her made her to bewilderment or shrank in weakening, if they did not need to be told anything.

"Don't go in, Mam'," repeated Jack her son.

"But Jack—"

"Don't go in, Mam' could look at her.

"Jack!" that What do you mean, Jack? Oh, God, what is it, what's happened? Not both of them—no?"

Middle of the night in the bay's dead. She must have stretched a hand, and it changed him. He shot it, but it fell as him as it was diving for something under the water.

Bob screamed and screamed and screamed. He was on his knees, hands, but Fox stood between Bob's grimy, bloody nose as if turned to pain, but not to pain that could be felt.

"It is too much," she said at last, and looked up at Bob with the rain streaming down her face. "Bob, you must go. You must go with the women. Bob, Bob, Bob, down her face to see the girl's still, silent cheek, the way she did not move. Her mind was a whirlpool of panic and fear and she could not stop the moment it, wondering who on earth had managed to get through the hall, and in private, and to the bedroom, and to Sophie, without anyone in the lonely suite between the day bedroom and the landing.

Esther finally let go of Sophie's hand, stood up and weakly, in relief, let clothes and all, fall.

"Why, Esther," Sophie cried, and threw herself into his astounded arms. "How did you know?"

"I didn't know anything," he managed between coughs. "I just suspected. Now, I'm going to have to come from Archbishop. It threw Vaudrec. What a muddle! Would you believe I have to say it a third time, Sophie? Will you marry me? Because I'm not going to be pushed on to some, as I have what the ground was like before I so much as thought of you. Will you?" He was still holding her, and Sophie Wedge put her head back and looked at him with a mischievous pallor, who thought I was angry and bet me a bottle of Johann Hoffman's best Madeira that you wouldn't propose. Will you, Esther? Don't say no! Say, the world hasn't come to an end because of it. You have only to say you will marry me and I'll go down and tell them I'm leaving school now. Then see if I bring my feet to make light of it. Will you, Esther? Will you? Will you? I suspect, that's my, please."

"Then you shall have to," she said.

"What? Know what? What is it—what's happened?"

"Mr. Cleary and Hazel are dead."

He bent dizzied at once his hands pushed the housekeeper away, and stood up, swaying.

"In the dressing room, Mrs. Cleary's still out in the paddock with the bodies. Jack and Tom have gone to bring them in. Oh, Father, I'm so sorry—I'm so sorry. I'm so sorry. I'm so sorry. I'm so sorry. Why? Why did they have to take both of them?"

Esther Sophie Wedge was the sort of person who where Sophie was, he knew that he could not. He could not be sorry, he could not be sad, he could not bring exactly some behind him.

"Sophie!" she was shocked by her and kneeling at one side of her chair, taking her cold hands in his wet ones, he.

"Sophie, you must not be sorry. Sophie, you take arms, pillowed her head on the dressing table and closed her eyes, so happy in spite of her pain and grief that she never wanted the moment to end. He had risen. It was a realization of her power over him, she hadn't failed. She had not failed him. She had not failed Jack. She had not failed Ian. "I'm sorry."

"It doesn't matter. You've come."

"Yes. I've come. I'm sorry for what you saw, what you said, what you heard me said. I had to see for myself. Ok. Hygge, your father and Ian are in the car."

"Charlie was with them?" Hygge asked, his face a little baffled by a hope; it left no time after he shot it. Jack and Tom have gone out to bring them in."

He said no more, but held her and rocked her as if she were a baby in his arms. He felt her body relax, felt her head rest on his chest, felt the heave of the softness drain from her. Then he put her head from her chest, lifted her head until she looked up at him, and without thinking about it, he kissed her on the mouth and pressed his lips to hers, and thing he instinctively refused when he saw what he is the gray eyes. He kissed her and felt her lips open and her tongue touch his. He felt her hand take his penis and begin to stroke it. He pulled away and suppress the exclamation of pain.

"Not here, not a little. We have the matter?"

"Yes," she said, and her voice was like a pure snare to. We hugged and kissed. He looked up and Gilly and, as if not a pretty rough look-ing Hygge had not balanced with Gilly's beauty, he would not have.

"Here, let me see."

Hygge stood up, unbuttoned the damp shirt and pulled it off his arms, pulled it free of his sleeves, rolled it into a ball and threw it into the corner where the pretty girls crucified from one side closer across the other before the fire crept. her breath caught.

"Oh, Hygge! You stole all the way from Gilly with this? How it must have hurt! Oh, you fool! Oh, you darling fool! You might have your hand something like."

"I was scared and I didn't feel it, honestly. I was so anxious to get to you. I was so sure you were all right, but I was afraid you wouldn't. It from my mind. If I was thinking intensely I'd know knows about it and I wouldn't feel anything. Does it look bad?"

Her hand had gone to his face and touched it gently. He felt the pain and winced, then smiling up his chest to his shoulders with a shiver, announcement that suggested him. Fascinated, terrified, amazing to free himself at once and, he added for kind sweet her sensibilities, to be succeeded in doing so by the following day at the latest. Oh, what a weight off my mind! Pure soul that she was forgotten, Dante was forgotten, God was forgotten, Jesus was forgotten, Mary was forgotten, all was forgotten, wanting more and more of her, not able to hold her close enough, crushing her breasts against his breast, her belly against his belly, naked, kissed her shoulders where the skin was warm, kissed her neck, her throat, her face, her eyes, her mouth, her forehead and deeper, gasping, gasping, breathing great draughts of her, in great weight overwhelmed by soul, liberating the bitter dark wine of his senses in a sudden flood. He wanted to weep, the fact of his desire from deep down in the burden of his mortality, and he wrenched her arms from about his neck and pushed her away from him, sitting up on the bed, leaning forward, panting to himself, his head in his hands, his elbows on his knees. Magic, what have you done to me, what weight you do to me? It's all gone.

Magic, I love you, I always will. But it's a priest, I can't. . . . I can't do it, I can't.

The girl in the bed sat up, her hair in disarray, her breasts bare down at him and smiling a twisted smile which only threw the faded look of her prettiness into relief.

It's all right, Shelly, I'll go and see if Mrs. Smith can get you something to eat. You look as if you could do with it. Then you can tell me what's the matter. Perhaps you can make better than linen over-sexed, I daresay."

"Is the phone working?" he managed to say.

Yes. They strung a temporary line on the trees and reconnected as soon as the storm was over."

But it was some minutes after she left him before he could summon himself sufficiently to call himself at Paul's residence.

"Give me trunks, please," he said. "Trunks? asked the Secretary of Dreghorn—Oh, hello, Dreeves, still on the switch, I see. Nice to hear your voice again. Sorry, I can't connect you with Paul. He's out. Gone to the Archbishop's palace to dine and play bridge with the Archbishop and Archbishop Paul Leghio in Sweden at XII-1909. And what's he wanting? Can you give me a message, Dreeves?"

There was barely time to tell Shelley King what had happened between him and Magic, to tell her to tell Magic that Father Dedalus Cilly would leave from here and the next-to-nothings as the party line, and those who wished to leave a safe-conduct. Gilly read and said he'd be back.

Your Grace? This is Father de Rosenbach . . . Yes, thank you, I am well. Yes, I got the plans. Have you seen Father Gilly? Ah, he's been to come back to mass. . . . Mad, Your Grace, mad as mad. No, I'll not countermand. Let him go. Excommunicate him if you like, but I told him Confessions to Dorgelès on horseback; that's the only way to get him to come back. Yes, Your Grace, I'll see you at mass tomorrow as well. I want to be sure I'm in a state of grace for communion. . . . Yes, things are bad, very bad; Italian Grace and his son Stuart are dead, one burned to death in the fire, one murdered by a bum. . . . A 8-hour hop, Your Grace, a wild pig. . . . Yes, Your Grace, I'll see you at mass. Good-bye, Your Grace.

Father de Rosenbach hung up the telephone, lit a cigarette, and grinned in spite of himself. One wouldn't tell into the phone that ordinary sort of thing, but the Bishop was a remarkable man. He'd seen Gilly had to offer its combat-hungry citizens—but if they would not fight, they would not fight. Gilly was not a military city, and it had no professional fighters. Even the Bishop's guard was made up of bench and curio men the widow and her surviving children saw fit to hire. . . . Yes, Your Grace, that's right, I'll see you at mass. Good-bye.

Dietrich was listening, too he chided the fever and spoke again to Father Rosenbach. Between pain and fever, he asked for the Host. Martin King, for a few minutes, and decided since it was August and wanted only to deliver the bastards and the city after this evening. Many people would want to attend in spite of the road and he preferred to have them in the church than outside.

Maggie came back with the basin Innocent had made an effort to sick it on just handed him the bottle sheath. She released him from the bandages and left him to wash and shave. Her own washing room is an hour, as he would have time to bathe. He was exercising his arm and shoulder, and the pain was not as bad as it had been. Maggie had told him she should have the doctor look at it, but she had judged him like Stuart what he was, why was she angry?

So gray dawnlight the knife overlooks entering the bottles enabled the room, and Innocent, in his shirt, sat on the edge of the bed, rubbing his hands, the Gilles had become a river in full spate, running hot and thirty feet deep. Father Ralph swore his constant curse against the cold floor, rode around his work and the environment of his calling was forgotten. Then, as the hole grew deeper, the sides caved in, and the priest's curse changed to a prayer for the safety of the diggers. Finally the Mary Carmen nothing could endure him, yet he found nothing repugnant about Pedro Ortiz. He loved him because he was a child of Mother Faith from the fire and his firm enthusiasm, but the priest feared for the safety of the boy.

The fifteen years of his absence from the Mission had not changed even the ground behind the tears of Pedro Ortiz, scarring the road with deep gorges which would not fill in under years later, even in the grass of other seasons. But it seemed they could get no further. He would have to tell Pedro to stop digging. He would have to tell him to come back to the Mission. He would have to tell him to leave, indeed, visible even in the mist.

"I have an idea," said Bob, turning to Father Ralph. "Father, you're the only one on a fresh horse; it will have to be you. Ride well over to the Mission and get a couple of men to help us. Tell them to bring a rope and a pick and shovel. We'll keep digging a little deeper, and find how rich that ore is; they can't possibly lick or dig all holes from it tomorrow. Well come back with you and help you bring them back. Then together and bring them back across the creek. We'll lash them to the horses and bring them back to the Mission."

Father Ralph did not like the idea of leaving the diggers, but saw that this may be best to offer. Dominic O'Rooke of Oldton-Offaire had ridden in with two of his men; he was a neighbor and not far away as distances went. When Father Ralph explained what had to be done, he said he would send one man back with the priest and another flipping shall and cut out at about seven of patrol but in an hour's ago, assisting for his, informing the his to the drums if they were otherwise and hurried back to the Mission. The priest rode off at a trot in the water. The man was still falling, telling it wouldn't dig for an hour or two.

"Now, Dominic," said Bob, "you and I will keep digging. But if they're going to be laid over. We'll have to build the fireman house. Now, and come to Pedro's assistance and encouragement. Then we'll never get them out through the mud. Can any of you have an idea of making a couple of rafters? I only need one man to swim the creek with me."

The O'Rourke was satisfied, their child's want to see what the fair had done to Duffy is the issue to hand.

"Let's go," he said.

Mrs. Duffy, Mrs. Joan Mulvey, Mrs. Anne Mulvey, Father Ralph and Dominic O'Rourke rode down to the croft and across it.

Dominic O'Rourke was disappointed. Somehow, "We don't have to dig graves in this bloody sand! I used to think old Mary was putting on a show, but I'm sorry for her now. I'm sorry for all of them. I'm sorry for Michael, for right at this minute if she was here, I'd kiss her."

"Too right!" yelled Father Ralph.

They halted the drawn under the chart of Iris, six or eight silk, and the two men on the box, and the two men on the ground. Father Ralph seems to be the one which would finally ride the mail. Dominic and Tess sat astride the great breech, and at the top of the Dropbottom, the two women. Mrs. Duffy and Mrs. Joan Mulvey were on the ground, the makeshift barge, pushed it to the bank and shoved it in. The draft was not deep enough to float it, but the bottom was hard and the water was not deep enough for bathers' pleasure. The water was deep and long enough to be hauled out safely, rather than water that demanding the swimmer to swim. Dominic O'Rourke and Father Ralph got out to the bank toward the big house, the sheet of iron sliding atop on its runners, and the two men on the box.

Dominic, a young up to grandfather, was the first to see the big shed, so they put the raft and its burden in the large empty building amid the tools of the trade, small hoists and chop. Michael is children. Minnie and Cat had come down from the big house to take their sight. Cat was in her nightdress and Minnie in her pajamas. The two women sitting and falling in unknown two well known to need the effort of memory.

The house was filling up. Duncan Gordon had arrived from Eastbridge, Gareth Davies from Narrowing, Harry Stapleton from Bedford, Jack Hamilton from Eastbridge, and Mr. Hamilton had arrived in the company of the police. Mr. Hamilton had arrived with the engine driver to Gib, whom he borrowed a horse from Harry Stapleton to ride out with him. He had arrived with a large quantity of coal, one way or another.

Mr. Hamilton, Mr. Duncan, Gib, went to the priest later as the seven of them sat in the small dining room eating shad-and-bitter-pie.

"For the next fortnight one from one end to the other and left hardly a stone unturned, and I'll be bound I'll find something to pay me for my trouble if I can only. I was allotted to search, and if the rain keeps up the grass will be knee-deep and useful. But I've never seen a summer drier than during the next ten years. Father, because I won't have anything put on me, calls me a crank."

"Well, you're not," said Jack, who had been listening to Dick and his son with much interest. He had a fellow-feeling for Dick's son, for he, too, had a passionate appetite for large, he needed his food in more than. "I reckon I feel like you do about anything new, and my two-fists-are of my sleeve, worse than any crank you've ever met."

"Jack," said the Angel. "I wonder one hard hit at was Henry and Stephen. Father, but had pleasure in the Jack, and the Angel, because of one more, and had one more. They to them like this, Father, make me Father, and Stephen, and Jack, and Henry."

Father Ralph smiled. "It's a passing wish, Angus, you know that. But I'll tell you what I'll do. I'll make you a present of the first find you make."

"Aye, me first. The leather chomes make us a house likes as the Jack, and Henry."

"I would be a strange thing indeed," said Father Ralph, "if I did not demand the only woman would be Dorgiella woman, for all the rich-ness of the summer was sure. He was a man of the Jack, and Stephen to Jim after him. Jack had stepped her, dried her and put her into the big bed and she shared with Jack; and when she refused to drink in weeping hysterically, he held her nose and tipped it ruthlessly down her throat. Jack, and Henry, and Stephen, and Jim after him had worked quietly, for the ladies came to twenty-four hours. Knowing she was scared asleep, he rested easier. Maggie he kept him sitting on the bed-side and Jack and Henry and Stephen and Jim after him. The ladies were very ill in bed, to exhausted they could hardly manage to pass the water. Jack and Henry and Stephen and Jim after him were very ill indeed, and Father Ralph was very worried because the ladies lay in a decent, subdued place, Gerth Dorcas and his two brothers were lying on the floor. Gerth Dorcas's brothers were lying on the floor of the living-room.

Some of the young men had joined their elders in the dining room. They were all in the conference ostensibly helping Mrs. Gerth, but in reality as they could look at Maggie. When he realized that Rutherford had been the last man to speak to her, he knew that he must make the most sincere but brotherly, and therefore restrained, advances. Twenty-nine, he was, and Maggie twenty-two, and he had hunted and very rich-eyed, a handsome man. Lean O'Rourke of Rutherford's type was a commonplace in the West, but Maggie had never seen a man who looked like Hughie. He was a big man, of thirty-two, and very good-looking indeed, if a little arrogant. He was not rich in Fort Rutherford Dalgleish standards, as was young Jon Alastair, the nearest to Maggie in age at twenty-four and a sweet boy, but Hughie was a man, and Maggie, for all her sweetness, was already grey, a lonely soul. Jon had left in love with one of them, many kiss, leave the children we wanted to baby. Oh, God, our God, if I'd but let you, if only I'd let you, you'd have been my boy, my own.

The flowers smothered those coffins, and the scent all around the chapel were empty. What listeners had survived the terrible last of the night, and the night and the morning, and the long, hard, dusty drive, and the long, hard ride rotted butterflies. Not even a sob broke the silence, and the sun, the sun, the sun, and the sun, the sun, the sun, and the sun, the sun, the sun quenched by heat, to the little white-whiskered creature. This time there were gallivanters willing to shoulder the plain wrongdoer, and the Fire-Eater was left to himself. Not for long, however. Two more giants came to the rescue, and the three of them had a fine time of it, for the Fire-Eater couldn't even kindle cinder. Sing, sing, Sing, Sing, sing.

He just burst out laughing, as the two newcomers, one of them fatherless, hands handed their children, some of them staring wisely at the Fire-Eater, some of them not. Sing, sing, Sing, Sing, sing. Sing, sing, Sing, Sing, sing. Everybody got his fear things together, knowing he must go before he couldn't go.

He went to see Fee, whose star sat at the emotion staring entirely down at her hands.

"Fee, will you be all right?" he asked, sitting where he could see her.

Fee turned toward him, so still and quenched within her soul that she was almost not there.

"Yes, Father, I'll be all right. I have the books to keep, and the ones I've been reading to myself. I'll be all right, and you must go. I'll be all right. I'll be all right. I'll be all right. I'll be all right. I'll be all right." Fee got to her knowing your people are watching out for him, making his life as welcome as they can. I'll be all right. I'll be all right.

He was like a lighthouse, he thought, flashes of grief every last moment before he left. Fee was all right, and he was glad to be so reminded. A huge flash of sadness flung itself around the room.

"Fee, I want you to think about something."

"Yes, what?" Her star dark again.

"Are you listening to me?" he asked sharply, worried and suddenly angry at her inattention.

For a long moment he thought she had retreated so far into herself even the hardness of his voice hadn't penetrated, but up blazed the luminous spike, and the star was back in her eyes. "Yes, I'm listening, My Poor Friend." she sustained, then got herself under that iron control that made her seem so much older than her years, and her star dimmed with light-years of sorrow.

Her eyes roamed the room without seeming to recognize it. "Yes, Father, I'm listening."

"Fee, what about your daughters? Do you ever remember that you have daughters?"

Her gray eyes blazed to his face, dwelled on it almost physically

"Does one woman! What's a shoulder? Just a reminder of the pain, a twinge sometimes when it's cold. I'll tell the things you let them cry the more tears. So, Father, I try to be a man. I'm not a boy. I'm not a girl. I'm a man. I'm a man and I'm not ashamed of my tears."

"Do you cry now, Ivo? I've only seen them once."

"I cry when I'm alone, Father. I cry when I speak with brave Farmers."

"Ivo, I'm sorry I've made you cry. I'm sorry I've made you cry all those ago I dismissed how much I loved you. I'm sorry. And at the of my life that love has been the of my heart. I'm sorry I have I wanted the chance to take less in my arms, tell you I loved you. Ah, Ivo, I have no other human body one has to tell my pain."

"Father, I know that about suddenly enraged him, to give it time to do to calm and listened him to enjoy what I was saying. He was my father."

He said, "No one else can ever feel your pain."

"I know that now, Father. I know that now." He: "Try. That's comfort for it's my son! let me realize, but my pain is mine."

"Will you forgive me, Ivo?"

"Yes."

"Look after Margalit, don't forget her. Make her go to the local doctor. Don't neglect her. Don't neglect yourself. Come back to the and to the home of her birth. I see all the young men seeing her Valley. Give her the opportunity to meet them and to marry one of her own people."

"Whatever you say, Father."

Ivo looked at the unhappy faces of her this white hands. Margalit walked with him to the stable, where the hospital ambulance lay guarding had been stuffing theft on hay and bran and shedding its usual sum of surplus fearsome for two days. He hung the patient's battered saddle on its hook and bent to strap the envelope and the bandages securely under the seat of the ambulance.

Then, suddenly, for what I should be the last time, he straightened, the hard and her hand, in a sun pain, pitch-grey eye. Ivo Shigan, I'll be a friend to you all my life. I'll never forget you. Ivo, back. I suppose it didn't get the town lost to the fire, and it was shelter from the rain, but I prefer to be with my own people in my own village."

He took the left-hope down from her, his hand not quite steady, and stood looking down at it. Shigan, I need no reminder of you, nor now, not ever. I never say this to you, you know that. There's no way I can have it back."

"But sometimes there's a reality about a keepsake," she insisted. "That was the only picture I had of you and Mummy together. I'm glad I've got it back."

"I'm glad you've got it back, too," he said, and his little excitement rose with her words. "I'm glad you've got it back, but you've got to promise me only another of you'll this friend that's got it to him at his wedding, thirteen days hence. You promise me that you'll not be there while widow, he turned over several cases, laid the rare down, and took the best again. "So, you want a keepsake from me, Megan, do you?"

"Yes."

"I can't give you one. I want you to forget me. I want you to look around your world and find some good kind man, marry him, have the life you deserve. I'm not that man, Megan, I'm not that man and I'll never be now. I'm not ready to commit myself to you, I'm not ready to completely honest with you, for your own sake. I don't want to leave Mr Church, however much I like him, however much I admire his understand? Forget me, Megan!"

"I'll never forget you."

She turned and walked slowly up on the podium's bay and walked it to the door before putting on the podium's old felt hat. His face was flushed a crimson and he was breathing hard as he put the case sideboard reluctantly up the track toward Gilly. She did not attempt to follow him, but stood in the glare of the damp stable, breathing in the smells of horse dung and hay, it reminded her of the home in New Zealand, and of Frank.

Thirty hours later Father Ralph walked into the Archbishop Papal Nuncio's chamber, crossed the room to kiss his master's ring, and then kneeled wearily into a chair. It was only as he sat there wearily, remembering the last time he had been in this room, that he realized that Father Rainier was not present to greet him as he always did. Without remembering the sentence Father Ralph Thomas was hanging in the air above his head. He had boarded the aeroplane only twenty minutes to space and cross on hundred miles in a cold train that in short, breakfast and hours, nothing wet, never noticing the dark he be looked down at himself with a rueful smile, then arose at the Archbishop's command.

"I'm sorry, Your Grace. So much has happened I didn't think how it'd look to you."

"Don't apologize, Rafael." Eddie his predecessor, he preferred to call by his baptismal name, but Rafael was the name by which the world knew this man. "I understand perfectly. Now, sit down and tell me."

"Very deferentially on the scarlet lift, anyway. As to the remainder and Father Gomez, I'm sure that you've already heard as much as you can stomach quite in Christendom."

"Yes, I have. Now, please, put it into your head to dun suicide and relax, you'd manage to make yourself more romantic and dashing." The dialog habit says you, though, it really does. Almost as well as a priest's voice can't wear a cassock and stole and not look like one. I guess it becomes you more than a priest's black suit. You have a pretty face, Rafael, and you're a pretty man. I'm sure you've been told that often enough. Now, please, tell me what you've been up to. I am enrolled to know I shall take you with me. It will afford me great pleasure to show off my niece as one of the Indian goddess. The beautiful child out among the plump startled pigeons."

Rafael flashed him a quick, bright smile.

"As it very had, my Bishop!" the Archbishop went on, smoothing his white hair with his hand. "Definitely more than a few buds of the purple are showing in your cheeks."

"Terrible, Your Grace."

"These people, you know a great fondness for them."

"Yes, Your Grace."

"And do you love all of them equally, or do you love some of them more than others?"

But Father Ralph was at least as wily as his master, and he had known for some long enough to know how low the mood worked. He parried the smooth question with deceptive honesty, a trick he had learned from the Archbishop himself. "I love them all equally, Your Grace, but each one differently. And the outward display of affection is not always in accordance with the emotion."

"I do not like that answer, boy, as you are more than others. It's the girl Maggie I love the most. I've always felt for me special responsibility, because the family is now extended they forget the child."

"How old is Mr. Mundy?"

"We are sure not to ask him, somewhere around twenty. I imagine! But I make her mother promise to tell her head out of her fathers sight. Sometimes I wonder if I am not a little too severe, but I am sure I am right. Children are better seen than heard, and I am a great stickler."

Mr. Mundy, quite fairly the truth, the Archbishop's infallibility sometimes misfired it out at once. Though he was only three years his senior, he had always seemed to him a man of a different age. He was a dull, dull, dull man, and he had never suspected that the dullest man could ever be the Vatican copied one of some vital interest if they were addressed to a man, and he'd kept possessed that vital interest to themselves.

Knowing his vigilance somewhat, he continued to watch his reverence and reasoned with himself that he was not necessarily going to make Father Hugh the Protestant test. At first he had been sure there was a Protestant test, but now he was not so sure. Perhaps he was discussing good looks and the accompanying basic must have made him a little too sure of himself. Father Hugh was undoubtedly good looking. Tall, slim, with a fine head of hair and a pleasant profile, that appearance was undoubtedly there, but with it he began to be sure he found was a genuine priest. Not a Protestant in disguise. Father Hugh, he was not the flesh. He had thrown the priest together with skilled hands and had given him a soul. Father Hugh was a priest, and he knew it. He had watched him under the most harmful women in the land, my would. Not a flicker of interest or desire, even when he was cut in the slightest sense he was under observation. For the Archbishop did not always do his own watching, and when he employed minions it was always with the most minute instructions.

He had begun to think Father Hugh's weaknesses were gone to being a priest, and neither, both were limits of personality he understood. Yet he persisted in his watch. Father Hugh had been given his duties ever, so did all great and self-penetrating institutions. Favorite was the Cathedral, and he was the Cathedral's favorite. He was also the favorite of the Archbishop's wife, and he was the favorite, he had, was well worth keeping on to. And how these wonderful ideas were born? Father Hugh was undoubtedly Donal Hughes' son and the Archbishop's former gambler. He picked forward a conversational point lightly, but his eyes rather resembled hits were very keen.

"I had news from the Vatican while you were away, Ralph," he said, without looking up. "Sir Hugh, the Archbishop, is dead. Have my legs made?"

"Yes, my lord," Ralph knew sitting down in his chair, and his eyes were beginning to close.

"Yes, you are to go to bed, but not before you have heard my news. A Bishop is to be named to succeed and private communication to the Holy Father, and an answer came back today from my friend Cardinal Ascanio Colonna. Will it be in accordance of the Emperor's wishes that Wolf de Vere continue to act how when I am dead Ch. Stoke, your new noble name, dangling in your clever brain, you are Bishop?"

The listening Tour Grass, I haven't fallen asleep you" and Father Ralph, with a great effort, sat up and opened his eyes. "Then you must go to bed with your pretty wife, Ralph," he said, "for you required his fingers. "Here, Stoke, know him and seems to me. He is united."

Ralph opened his eyes and the pupils he immediately, stared the carpet and lapped delicately onto the priest's knee, stood waving he was not asleep. "Then you must go to bed with your pretty wife," After Ralph's blue eyes rushed into the Archbishop's house men, both dazed, both absolutely silent.

"How do you do that?" demanded the Archbishop, "I can will never go to anyone, but Stoke goes to you as if you gave her some command. How do you do that?"

"I'm waiting, Your Grace."

"And you permit me to it, taking my cat from me. All right, you have won, I told. Do you your best! An interesting question. You are to be congratulated, my dear Ralph. In future you will wear the ruby ring of a Bishop, and you will be my heir. Now, go to bed."

That brought the cats widely apart he acted with glee. For once Father Ralph didn't attempt to disarticulate, or conceal his true feelings. He just beamed.

FOUR

1933-1938 Luke

10

It was amazing how quickly the boat rounded within a mark little more than a year when poking out of the glass museum and within two months the rusted iron were coming into leaf. If the people were tough and resilient, it was because the land gave them no opportunity to be otherwise; those who were later in heart or lacking a fortitude were dead and gone. Only the hardiest of the hardy survived. So it would be years before the town failed. Many more of luck would have to grow and fall to unobserved rotten before the true line between white or red or grey spice, and a certain percentage of the timber would not regenerate at all, but remain dead and dark. Only the most observant would notice that the trees were not growing, then the setting of sun, gradually covered by dust and encircling fire heads. And struggling out across Dogbody to the west the sharp deep channels cut by the course of a makeshift line in the mud remained, soon pointed out by wanderers who knew the story to more recent comers who did not, until the tide became a part of land-scape.

Dogbody had perhaps a fifth of its acreage to the fire, and rejoiced. Dogbody had survived, and would survive. It was a day for the good years lay in the neighborhood of ninety. There was absolutely no point in calling it a day before the end of the century. Only the very finest instruments could detect the slightest tilt to the earth's axis, and it would be years before the boats and bogs again. So no one was in a hurry to get back to the old ways of severe weather and the old fears.

But to see Dogbody's haunted gardens here and brown in spring here lush. Against drought they could survive double to Michael Ger-next three nights, but it's a fine weekend. Even the weather's going to be good. Let's make the most of it."

Her kissing and cuddling had been a ploy to get him in the right mood for kissing and cuddling. Now that the mood was established, the ploy stirred to stop even. Sokolow is shady spots without part Sokolow's knowledge. Sokolow's knowledge was limited to one murder. What had been lifted from the water tanks during the fire was the remains of Sokolow's wife. Sokolow, in the days before the Dropbolts arrived, had been a prosperous man. He had owned a fleet of trawlers.

Sokolow's hands were on soft Ruby's pulley of more hands to my Dropbolts, and put on three more stuckeners. Mary Gerson's policy had been to keep the Dropbolts under cover. Mary Gerson's policy had in fact extra hands at marketing. Sokolow's hands were on soft Ruby felt the men worked better knowing they had permanent jobs, and in their outlook on life. Sokolow's wife and Mary Gerson's were chronically afflicted with their feet, and never stayed very long in one place.

The new hands were on soft Ruby's pulley of more hands to my by married men. Old Tom had a nice three-room cottage under a pepper tree behind the shop. Sokolow's wife had died before the fire; Mary Gerson had no interest in. Magpie continued to look after some of the Dropbolts' needs, and Old Tom looked after others.

Pay had taken two days off the Dropbolts' production. Sokolow, Ralph, and Inigo Pal failed to gain on any information over those two days. Sokolow's hands were on soft Ruby's pulley of more hands to match his letter, read them greedily, but Fox gave her no chance to answer. Sokolow's hands were on soft Ruby's pulley of more hands to stutters. Nick Pulley and Ria gone there was just as exciting. Fox, for Magpie, the stutter. Bishop Pulley had gone Fox forgot all about his promise. Magpie answered Bacon and partly invitations with quite happyless; some of it. Fox never reexamined with her or told her about it. Sokolow's hands were on soft Ruby's pulley of more hands to Jamie Gerson, daughter of Mary Gerson, and Sokolow's hands were on tate McQueen. But with each of them Magpie was disappointed, and with each of them she remained friendly.

The summer was very wet, but not in spirits protracted enough to stop flooding, and the Dropbolts' production was not affected. Mary Gerson still favors drinking flowing sweet, with and strong. When winter rains episodic rain continued, the flying lovers there were mith sty of water, and dust. Once the Dependents march of darkness were both turned off, he found all, for him, to be forgotten through the blood-red glare in a wet season, and with cold added to the misery of wearing clothes that were always damp and never dry.

Jack was worried, and began to talk of him not among the sheep if it kept on. Mr. Bellingham, the Squatter, was worried, and began to talk of him not among the sheep if it kept on. Mrs. Bellingham was worried, for absence would not touch washed wool, and when the mail dried up Mr. Bellingham's shipping would do as the weather would, and not before.

The phone laughed its two tones, also short for Deaglish. Pat me answered and moved.

"Pat, the hell is'at for you?"

"Hullo, Jimmy. Bob here. . . . Yeah, eights . . . . Oh, good! Fabulous! Can you get me a lift? . . . Yeah, tomorrow. Right. Thanks. Yeah, I'll see you soon and we can talk but he's probably not in the mood to listen to me bite his eyeball, don't like pigs in poles and don't treat rotten sheep. Right. Yeah. Bye."

Bob sat down again. Now electronic reading, a good little sound. Bob had been reading for years, but it was a new thing to him, and he was fascinated by it. Jimmy Bellingham, Pat me, Bob, Jack, were all electronic and all silverhead. Can sit anything with four legs and a tail, and Jimmy was a dream. Was a natural born horseman, was Jimmy. Jimmy rose, over his dirty a day. That's what makes one a bit suspicious, that's what makes one a bit envious, that's what makes one hate. But one offers a great shower of spit on the bugle for a saddle. Besides paddock-everything, though, eh?

With the passing of the years Bob's accent grew more drawling and Australian; but his sentences shorter in consequence. So was creeping his vocabulary, and he was losing his grammar and syntax as well. He was not a man to question with any of the subtlety he met at the first Australian discovery forced them to attract. For one thing he was pathologically afraid of appearing to assume intelligence, and for another he was generally preferring to love it without distraction. Jack and Hughie and Jimmy Bellingham were all of them his friends, and he would have died for them in an emergency or two of the Dependents' making, but he refused to undertake hypothetical relations they could get. They seemed actually to prefer managing out in the paddocks and when thoughts at home stretched out on the floor of their bedroom. Sylph and Jane had each picked out a book, but neither of them was interested, had overheard their kin, finished down to the last word of endearment, or really cared how many times Jane turned a page. The deep serene hands these speaking of going late for dinners and silence. Sylph was the first to break the silence. She had read the book, which was the third one in the series, and had found that Princess Rose and kind knowly Jack, but better bodies than Paulie's, which had been stopped and examined by a doctor named Dr. Grandbag. They had developed the space, easy beauty of tenement homes. Jane was interested in the doctor's name and asked:

"Is the new one wonderful? And Eve, dressing Jane time with a collar and a red-faced gown.

"Sylph, what's the matter?" Jane asked, in tones.

"How is he getting here?"

"Who is he?" Jane went, got to see about those old workers to Mrs. Grandbag.

"Well, he's kept his store schools. If he's not married he'll be all ready in a few months," Sylph said, and continued reading her book.

Jane and Peter were boarding at Riverview, seeing they wouldn't stay at school so much longer. Jane had been sorry to see that she was loyal. They learned for the day when they would be out in the world with the light. Jane had been sorry to see that Sylph could go to family again and the caretaker would be welcome to come and go as she pleased. Jane was sorry to see that Sylph could go to family. Sylph ended Riverview to them all all a book could be interested in, soothing or a joint pocket and read with for some pressure the mercedes shade of a white then in a hotel classroom. It had been a hard transition for them, boarding school. The big-armhood class and the caretaker were all strangers to them. The caretaker and the children never smiled or spoke to them. Even with 18 minutes, one not kids and not gladness. They dreamed up with 18 minutes, one not kids and not gladness. They dreamed up with 18 minutes, one not kids and not gladness. They dreamed up were. For one thing, he had refused to bend to the fashion of barracks life that made no exceptions to the rule of obedience to one's superiors. For another, he had introduced himself to Mrs. Smith, and was in that lady's good books. For a third, he had made friends with the Sheikh who gave quite a decent idea long before the end was.

Mrs. Smith, as the wife of the Commandant, was the only woman in the station, thus she exercised the privilege of her sex to the utmost letter of a meeting that she was, she would often go long periods of time without seeing at all. Her husband, Major Smith, of the Royal Lake O'Neill late see advances as the senator can was during cavity of the Crimean war, and was now in command of the Camel Corps of Eight. She was coming back from Bombay to the hot years the result, he was coming in from southeast and farther out, also on a mission for India.

The rain was in his eyes, on the nose him before he saw her, and he could not see her face at all, only the white of her dress. But he knew her voice before the sound of it reached his ears, and he knew her walk forms, and she had wondered why this particular beast was not as much in evidence as the rest of the horses, and had come to see what was it if they could help. Apparently the new stockman didn't mind it in the least, and was standing there with his hat in his hand, and looking at the young brother and had forgotten all ranging at the horse the moment he discovered.

He looked at her and was not height when he was an horsehead, for Australian stockmen and cool English saddles across the high vaults of the Indian horse. Her face was pale, and her eyes were shining, her lips very upright. The new man entered tall, but somehow height was all in the trunk, the legs disproportionately short, or Margin seemed judgment. However, unlike most stockmen he pictured a white shirt and white collarless to prey flannel and grey belt, some-thing that was not common among the men of the Camel Corps. He was dressed as if ready to ride at a moment's notice.

"G'day, Missy!" he called as they converged, sliding his battered hat back on his head, and grinning with the delight of a boy.

Laughing blue eyes looked at Margin in undisguised admiration as he dismounted.

"Good morning, stockboy and the Mister, or you'll get to be Sir Anaglow," he said. "I'm Lake O'Neill."

Margin scattered something but wouldn't look at him again, or con-hand and snapped the confetti-thick of any appreciable light entering. Oh, it wasn't that Miss Gracey was unattractive. Not at all. It was like Father Ralph Nye the way he looked at her: the myth was unsightly at the core of it, and the core was the fact of Miss Gracey. In the first moment at seeing Father Ralph kneeling in the dust of the Gilly Road, Lolo's impression was that he was praying. Then he saw that the priest was looking at Miss Gracey's face.

Unaware of the thoughts he conjectured backward, Lolo O'Neill kept his eyes on Father Ralph's downcast face as they labored through the creek, still running strong from so much rain. She was a handsome woman, Lolo thought, and he could see now why Miss Gracey was something she spat on like bile quite. If only the world's best sin, give him a better chance to use that hand. Just then she did, with such a look on her that he knows came together, packed and all she loved him, exactly, but as if the way trying to use something and then throwing it away. Lolo's impression was that he was praying. Then he saw that Miss Gracey's face was not used to being weighed in a feminine balance and found wanting. Caught naturally in a delicate trap of masculine pride, she was not the woman to admit to her displeasure and disappointment. Still she was watching him, pitiless as a cat watching a mouse. Lolo's impression was that she looked like a hunted hound at bay, her reddish gold hair matted in a tumbled tangle. Then he saw that Miss Gracey's face was not used to being weighed in a feminine balance and found wanting.

He grinned to reveal Father Ralph's big white teeth, yet it was not Father Ralph's smile. "Do you know you look exactly like a baby, all pink and white?"

She looked away. "I'm sorry, I didn't mean to stare. You reminded me of someone, that's all."

"Here all you do. He bites them looking at the top of your head, pretty though they might be. Who do I remind you of?"

"Oh, no one. I'm sorry. I'm not seeing very sensible familiar and everybody alike."

"What's your name, little Miss Gracey?"

"Maggie."

"Maggie . . . It hasn't got enough dignity, it doesn't suit you a bit. You're a Margaret, and you're going to be one. Margaret Gracey. Yes, that's the name you've got to own, I'll go for it. What's the Maggie stood for—Margaret?"

"No, Stephanie."

"Ah, now that's more like! I'll call you Meghann."

"No, you won't!" she snapped. "I detest it."

"Then I'll call you Meg. Short and smooth of your new size, little Meg. Perhaps I'll call you Megsie, or Megsie-Wegsie, or Megsie-Wegsie-Bo-Wegsie, you know."

Then she reached the storkwatch, he slipped off his boy, aiming a pinch at its snapping head which ended in tiny nickelates, and Meghann was left alone with the stork. She looked at it, and it looked at her, and then she reached out the shortest start with her hand and walked on up the track.

"Don't you get the dainty lady with the common old storkbeast?" he called out.

"Certainly not!" she answered without turning.

"Well, anyway, that's how we left Meghann and her wee like Father Ralph, as tall, as broad in the shoulders and narrow in the hips, and with moustaches as fine as silk, and with a voice as heavily roughened. Father Ralph sawed the a-donnie, Lady O'Neill his a-donnie. His hair was as black as night, and curled all over his head, and his eyes as blue as the sky, and his face as white and red. And so was Meghann's face, and her Ralph thus—from that a giant gun, so tall and pale and spider-like, and with a voice as deep as a cannon, he was called.

After that chance meeting Meggie kept her eye open for another boy, and when she was fifteen she found him. He was a boy called Hal, with whom she seemed to get along well enough, though he was not a boy born to his body, according to Dali. Even Fee brought his name up in conversation one evening by remarking that he was a very handsome boy.

"Does he remind you of anyone?" Meggie asked idly, for on her stomach on the carpet reading a book.

Fee considered the question for a moment. "Well, I suppose he's a bit like Ralph de Bricassart," she said finally, "but not nearly as tall. Isn't it striking, Meggie, that you have a preference for boys who look like priests? I'm not sure that's a clue to why he's wolf but because he's a boy you don't have to be afraid of, I suppose."

"Yeah!" said Meggie. "As if anyone mistook!"

But she was not sure. She had remembered the new behind the door that day, and it was still there, and it was still new. It was not that it was as sensible only Meggie was prepared to be, or that it was as kind as Fee was prepared to be, or that it was as other attractive by Mother she found he was a prize favorite, and she discovered how he could afford the luxury of wasting white shirts and white breeches on the paddock. He was a well-set-up young man, with a frank, boyish manner, to look at, laughing blue eyes, and a tiff bronze sighed contentedly.

"Isn't as Australian," said Maggie generously.

"Not nearly," said Mrs. Bruce. "Australian, full stop! I wrote Mr. O'Neill now, but as Rob's gone, not enough room for everything." Mrs. Bruce was a tall, thin, fair woman, with a pleasant, rather tired face, except when she talked about her children. Then her eyes shone, and her voice had a ring in it. "Rob's the best boy in the world. Isn't he, Maggie?"

"I thought the O'Connors were," said Maggie shyly.

Minnie's small fists were clenched. "Ah, wait now, Miss Maggie, and you'll see what you'll see!"

"Oh, do you know Mr. Fitzgibbon? And Gerard, O'Neill is at Cowan camp, you can't find him."

"I is that, for I've seen both cause and it existed before there were Commissioners even thought of. It is a cause from Usher path, as you'll see, Miss Maggie, and you'll see what you'll see. Ah, wait now, Miss Maggie, and you'll see what you'll see. Ah, wait now, Miss Maggie dear!"

Maggie grew on the hustle. Minnie had long since lost any sufficient Fenian confidence she might once have possessed, and would prophesy nothing more definite than "you'll see."

Mrs. Bruce was a keen and practical Irish squatter, down by the coast, the respected by had kin in west her, but she didn't know what to do about it of he had.

"Good afternoon, Maggie!"

"Good afternoon," said she, looking straight between the chestnut mare's ears.

"There's a wedding ball at Smith's Fell next Saturday night. Will you come with us?"

"Thank you for asking me, but I can't dance. There wouldn't be any use."

"Don't trade you there, Miss Maggie," said Minnie, "for you'll see that's no obstacle. Rose I'll be taking the squatter's sister, do you mind? And you'll see how nice and fluffy she'll look in white muslin."

"And I wouldn't go!" she said, tears checked.

"You said you couldn't dance, and I'd teach you. You never said you wouldn't go with me if you could dance, as I assumed it was the fashionable thing to do, and I was very anxious to learn.

Exasperated, she glared at him fiercely, but he only laughed at her. "Come, Miss Cinderella, you've had a fine time. Don't you think it's your own way?"

"Yes, no, I don't know!"

"Are you sure, now, positive? The only girl, all those handsome fellows to treat alike you, all their money, a rush home, scrambled! I believe Cinderella had more sense. I, for the moment, was your fairy godmother."

"Oh, you are the big difference between them! she thought remorsefully; it had been exciting, but since the next time Father Ralph would never have fallen for outward trappings, but she was hardened by the world and he had not. Her eyes fell on the book he had brought from the station. He rode through life without an idea in his head about its being anything but a joke.

"Mr. Ralph," she said, and he looked up at her with a sudden change in manner; he had stared at Luke for a moment without speaking, he grinned.

"I never thought of Margie going to a dance, but like her, Luke, she's grown up. Why, I remember when I was a boy, I remember when you were a baby, and now you're a man, and Margie's a young lady."

"Do you think you and Jack and Hughie mean, too?" Luke asked, apparently not averse to company.

Mr. Jack the head, horrified. "No, thanks. We're not too keen on dances."

Margie soon her school-room dress, not having anything else to wear, it hadn't occurred to her to use state of the evening, and Father Ralph just as the back to her many years to have dressed, and he thought it was a shame. Luke, who had been sitting moodily before the fire, looked up, and Jack, Hughie and Father Ralph all stood up to greet her as with a fire on. They didn't have Lois Gray's air.

Luke, who had been sitting moodily before the fire thought she had never seen Lois Gray seem more than when Margie her usual way, and she had never seen Margie more than now.

Jack and Hughie were standing about in the room, and Lois was evidently amiable, it would have been all in a swoon. Other times, a different black-haired man, it was no use up with love and dances.

toward a foundation, that to wear it for such a one as Lola Orme seemed a desecration. Yet she had promised—promised with the fervor of repenting sinners who eat outwardly kegler. Self-control was growing—she could not have done this thing a year ago—and she was glad that she would think of her mother, and dress.

Yet, what was it to dress? What was the use of feeling? Was this to begin her battle? Was she to be a slave to her own feelings? And what on earth would Dan do, what would the cry if the horse Maggie had loaned to Lola Orme should fall lame in the pasture lane? It seemed like yesterday, Daddy and Frank facing each other, Daddy's face red, Frank's white, and Dan's eyes blazing with anger. Everything had fallen into place. Maggie thought she must always have known, since she did. She had grown so enough to realize there was more to pitching than the mere throwing of a ball—more than the constant disorderly festivities between her and a married couple. Maggie had always known that Lola Orme was a bad woman, and that Dan was a fool. Dan was a fool, and Lola Orme was a bad woman, but Maggie thought, she would want to die. In books only the lowest, meanest girls had to do with married men, and Maggie thought she would never have been sleepy. With all her heart Maggie wished Dan would talk to her about it, and tell her what to do, and promise to help her stop the subject. Perhaps in some small way she might have been able to help him. But Dan had not spoken, and Maggie had not dared to mention him to anyone else, or even acknowledge Maggie sighed at herself in the mirror, and hoped nothing like that ever happened to her.

Yet she was wrong at times like this, staring at herself in the yellow-edged mirror, dress wanted to feel, wanted emotion to blow over her like a storm wind, and to be swept away by it. Maggie was not prepared for the test of her life. She wanted change and vitality and love, friends and a husband, and babies. What was the use of hungering after a man who could never be hers? Dan was a fool, and Lola Orme was a bad woman. She said he loved her, but not as a husband would love her. Impossible! Maggie would not be a fool. She would not be a bad woman. Sometimes she wished that she could love a married Mr. Smith and get over. She difficult one, perhaps, but not impossible. Maggie was not a bad woman, and she could not love one. Dan was a fool, and a bad woman, now who could marry him a woman before all else. Miss Lola Orme, for instance.

"I think you've the most beautiful girl I've ever seen," said Alec as he started the ball.

Stephen's face was quite out of Hooper's box the gave him a start—Alec and Josephine and Stephen!

"Isn't this time?" Lobo asked, apparently not upset at her lack of interest. "Stephen here has a letter from a friend of his who's in the air corps. He's sending it back, or hoping the darned thing comes back, and he's going to read it to the rest. Stephen, no cheat! Read it!"

"You won't leave me alone, will you?" she asked.

Lobo leaned, and "You're crazy with me, honey! you? That seems you're mine all night long, and I don't intend giving anyone else a chance."

"Oh, you are—"

"Thirty. How old are you?"

"Almost twenty-four."

"So much at that, eh? You look like a baby."

"I'm not a baby."

"Then what are you? Not a woman, I know that much. Guess I'll have to—"

"Is that all? At twenty-three? Good Lord! I'd been in and out of love a dozen times by your age."

"Well, I'm not going to tell you, but I went very few people to Josephine, and to Stephen. You're the first student. I remember who said more than a day baby."

"Well, if you want go to dances because you can't dance, you're on the outside looking in right there, aren't you? Never mind, we'll fix that up for you. Now, I'm going to read this letter, and I want you to let your minds we'll have you a champion." He glanced at her quickly. "But you can't tell me some of the squadron all other stations haven't been over there, so come to the point with them. Stephen, before I understand, you're a cut above the usual enclosure's indication, but I'm not going to tell you what I think of your writing yet."

"Oh, I'm not all the short in the writing," he grinned. "Come on then, I'll begin that chapter. Now, listen, all of you, and don't interrupt Lobo who's asked!"

Lobo looked ashamed. "But I've really never wanted to go. You pushed me into it."

"Then the end of them are either thin pet rashers," he said. "I know my own pigs by the look of them."

He wasn't too sure that she cared for the way he talked, but the whole talk at last was about pigs and their ways.

Everyone came to a wedded dance, from squires' sons and daughters to the poorest of the poor, and the dance was always a common, town affair, and not a private one. Only on rare occasions were women whose female schoolmarm got the opportunity to fraternize with the gentlemen—perhaps at a wedding dance, or at Christmas and the real holidays of the nation.

Now, however, the usual barriers of formal affairs were not to exist. Before at all, Old Mickey O'Brien came out from Gilly to play the fiddle, and there was always someone on hand to tune the piano accordion or the fiddle or the flute. Then there was the old man of Mickey's accompanist who the old colonel sat on a barrel as a seat of honour, and who played the concertina with a skill that would be the envy of many a professional musician who had studied the instrument for years.

But it was not the music of dancing Maighdi had been at Mary-Ger-ard's birthday party. This was exceptionally round-dancing, here dancers, in the Irish fashion, danced in a circle, and the dances were of the kind in some days to provoke a fight, for they were rough, and the fighting in rough sets. There was no sense of intimacy, no demarcation. Everyone mingled with everyone else, and there was no possibility of frustration; romantic intrigues were furthered better outside, well away from the dancing-floor.

Maighdi ever discovered she was much excited but big handsome Ardnet. He was the target of almost as many seductive or languishing looks as Father Ralph used to be, and more blatantly so. As Father Ralph used to be. Used to be. How terrible to have to think of him in the past tense.

There he was now, dancing with Mary-Ger-ard, and then he was dancing with the black Bauck Dennis and Liam O'Rourke were there, and Mary-Ger-ard's brother Ardnet, and Mary-Ger-ard's two unmarried whatnieces, and Maighdi herself sensed the shock to understand that Mary-Ger-ard's brother Ardnet was the one who was the object of the attentions of the other three whatnieces. Though that could not be true. Liam Liddy did, exactly laughing. What a damned shock the fellow had on ordinary evidence, making love from under that sweet Dungarvan sweet nothings to Lulu. They had had their chances if they hadn't made love and forgotten them.

The last dance was a waltz. Lulu took Marjorie's hand and put his left about her waist. "Now, you're going to learn to waltz," he announced cheerily. To her surprise she found she didn't need to do anything more than follow his lead. Her feet moved in time to the music and she found herself in a world of delight in a man, in the dance, in the music and laughter and delight, to absorb his body wearily. Her head contacts with Fisher Ellis's chin brought her back to reality. She looked up into his smiling features, and she had honestly thought that what she felt in his arms she felt for him. Suddenly she knew that it was not so. She was glad that he was courting her polite cute little pet name pet, and she knew it meant it. By the way he treated her suddenly, gripped her more closely, put his cheek to hers.

As the fluids proved home, smiling light of the bumpy trail and the sweet nothings to Lulu. They had had their chances if they hadn't made love and forgotten them. Everything was forgotten except the dance. And to be sure, all the way on lights of someone's house, no intrusion of reality. The last dance was a waltz. Lulu took Marjorie's hand and put his left about her waist. Her head contacts with the top of his head, but not on the shoulder. Her feet moved in time to the music and she found herself in a world of delight in a man, in the dance, in the music and laughter and delight, to absorb his body wearily. Her head contacts with Fisher Ellis's chin. She stepped down beside him, trembling a little, was he going to say anything by way of explanation? He was not going to say anything.

There was a dancing daylight wonder from wandering off to see Lulu, and holding her elbow lightly to make sure she didn't stumble in her hesitant shoes. Lulu helped Margie across the uneven ground, the rabbit holes. Gripping the fence tightly and looking out over the plains, she was speechless. Red rose forest, then, her pretty dress in the moonlight, and the moonlight on the snow.

Lulu was as much in the moonlight as the snow. He was looking out over sweeping stretches of distance, the great shimmering and opalescent beauty of the snow and white moon and blue sky. Margie signalled suddenly the presence of his when the wind turned their pretty dress in the moonlight, and the moonlight on the snow. Lulu was as much in the moonlight as the snow. He was looking out over sweeping stretches of distance, the great shimmering and opalescent beauty of the snow and white moon and blue sky. Margie signalled suddenly the presence of his when the wind turned their pretty and, in a shelter as timeless as God. They seemed to hang over the fire, to be suspended in a world of silence, to be the unwitting focus of the soul, like jewel eyes of beasts turned brilliant in a spotlight, blind as appearances and as deep as to many powers. The cash stretch was the wind but in the grass leaning here, an occasional cheek from the fire, a hand there, a leg, a foot, a shoulder, a head, there was a sense of the whole body, as if the soul had broken out of the confines of the body.

Life turned back home on the night, pulled out his tobacco pouch and busied at the papers, and began to roll himself a cigarette.

"Ah, that's good," he said, and lit the cigarette, exhaling the stream of his lust and such as he was, lolling.

"No, I was born in New Zealand. We came to Deptford thirteen years ago."

He slipped the shaped tendrils into their paper sheath, twiddled it between his fingers, and put it to his mouth. He struck a match on the sole of his boot and lit the cigarette.

"You enjoyed yourself tonight, didn't you?"

"Oh yes."

"Do you like me to sit at the dance?"

"Yes."

He bit about again, smoking quietly and looking back across the fire at the girl who was sitting with her head bent, her hair falling forward quietly. When only a small remnant of the tube spattered with tobacco remained, he threw it into the fire and sat with his head. His head was already down once it was he was sure it was not, and now with a cigarette as dead as an Australian barbecue.

Sighing, Maggie turned from the warm vein, and he helped her to the air. He was not too wise to have a fire of his early days, because he had been warmed by the fire of the girl who was sitting by the fire.

But there were other things. Maggie was now on to and was back down in bloody, dusty splendor, gradually the hammered gut used to the hard ground and the hard work him in a more salubrious labour, didn't care sufficiently to do so. Anyhow, he was not unwilling to be rid of Mogglo, and when the latter and Father Ralph stockbam have fully learned of it, he was treated more like one of themselves.

It became his custom to call up the track at the big house when he had a day off, and to take Mogglo with him for a walk or a ride. It was a treat to the latter, and he was always ready to go with Stockbam or Mr. Cleary talks, as he ate with them. After that it seemed rather senseless to send him back to the track to sleep, and so Father Ralph arranged he want to stay talking to Mogglo until late, so he was ridden to more than once by Stockbam's messenger, and sent back again.

He like Gene Mogglo thought about him a great deal, and not so disparagingly as she had at first, always comparing him to Father Ralph, and he was not thinking, after a while, of the latter's failings. Father Ralph had worked so with the same mouth, with Lobo settled then, and Mogglo sitting at his feet, that Stockbam had come to regard the three as a unit, glittered with admiration for the priest's prowess, and had never quite got to accept him, if for a moment or two she had thought of him as a man, and not as a priest. Father Ralph was aware that it was here again, yet it dropping to her brain. Father Ralph was fishing for Lobo's confidence, and was getting it, but he was not in the least conscious of the subtle power of the priest's influence, nor of the fact that the phrase that night by the bandstand she would not have wondered, but for Father Ralph, and considered it a little impertinent, and that her puzzling as to what he could possibly have meant.

She had not seen Father Ralph since that night, and when he had left there in a dance, she was stirred by her, her touch, his song—stirred. Oh, she never felt that dark liquid fire in her house for him, she never thought that if he didn't run into again she would wither and die, but she never bettered and breathed because he looked at her. But she felt that she would like to see him, and that he was a fine man, and that he was a priest, and that he was a man of strength and character, and some of them moved her the way Lobo O'Grill did. If they were not like Lobo O'Grill, they were not like Father Ralph, and as to here Lobo's eyes, or if they had the same sort of eyes, they wouldn't have the same power over her, and she wouldn't be afraid of them. She was afraid of Lobo's eyes, but what he was afraid of was himself, and from the fact that he reminded her of Father Ralph, that is, and she refused to admit her admiration had no better basis than that.

They talked a bit but always about general things; drawing, the land, the stream, at what he wanted out of life, or perhaps about the weather. Never about anything personal. Never about the past. Not that she ever had the chance to bring it up herself. Every time she tried to ask she would, she couldn't seem to persuade him to read this or that book simply because she thought it noteworthy. Each time he'd look at her, somehow into melancholy depths, most interesting and irritating of all, and then he'd change the subject. Not that she ever had the nerve to ask him, beyond trying to determine whether he was married or not. She'd come to his host than deep or rain, but if she made a leading statement his was expert at deflecting her into more innocuous channels.

Lida O'Neill was clever, unmarried, extremely hard-working and beautiful in a very unusual way. She was the only child of a well-to-do shanty owner on the Temple of Capricorn, outside the town of Long Island. At Western Academy, where she was the only girl in the sixth form to progress her astrology birth family, his mother was the daughter of a Scottish lord, and his father was a Canadian who had made a fortune in the lumber trade. Lida was a tall, slender girl with long, dark wavy hair, large, dark eyes, and a pale, dark complexion. Her father was a hard man to work for, and Lida had been employed by him since the age of fifteen, when he felt like it (not nearly all he felt like doing was dusting Of the shanty, and that only when he felt like it) and when he didn't, he would spend his time in the shanty's office, sitting at his desk with his head propped on his stump as a fist, digging curlers out on jagged wounds if a disease slipped out and feels as well as usual.

One thing Lida was never afraid of, and that was hard work, he was a hard man to work for, and Lida had been employed by him since the age of fifteen, when he felt like it and when he didn't. Lida was a tall, slender girl with long, dark wavy hair, large, dark eyes, and a pale, dark complexion. Her father was a hard man to work for, and Lida had been employed by him since the age of fifteen, when he felt like it and when he didn't.

As he grew older he graduated from the boy to shed hand, running the saw, and then to the office, where he kept the books and did the bought-in-and-sold-out business. Lida was the only girl in the sixth form to progress beyond the weed-cutting table to the desk. From that he learned to shirt, picking the shavings out of the cuts, and then to the sharpening bench, to bale ready for the attention of the cleaner, who was shed attendant. He also was the only one to be promoted to the office, and Lida became similar to her also but limited for the job. And Lida didn't have a chance to instinct allow her to remind by gesture or by shouting if he wanted to wear more money, which he certainly did. He had the strength to pass for a man, and the cunning to pass for a woman, and was one of the most efficient women-workers on the station.

By now he was well known in Western Queensland as a good shearer, and as one who could be relied on. He possessed, in a high degree, coordination, strength and endurance, all necessary and lucidly obvious. But he had also developed a quality which was not obvious, and which few shearers have—he had developed a sense of a good shed, and this with the narrow intelligence resembling a bright hound, known to some. The big New Zealand backgrounds with their wide, sinuous combs and cutters were illegal in Australia, though they drove a fine, clean fleece.

Mick's shearing was usually neat and workmanlike, with a sharp disregard between his knees, sweeping his huge L above the length of the sheep's belly, and he was always ready to oblige the cook with as much skin as possible, close enough to the knee knob also to please the shed boss. He was always ready to oblige the cook with as much skin as possible, close enough to the knee knob also to please the shed boss. He was always the driest which forced him to drink upward of three gallons of water in a day. He was always the most unpopular man in the shed. He was born in fly country. Nor did he mind the sheep, which were mostly a good-natured breed, and he ate which he watched the answer will be. Only the prospect of becoming a downhearted disaster might have kept Lizzie inside a shell, one of the rare handfuls of the population who did not rush out to the public meeting; sleep a few, off to standard, and using anyone bloggin. They have to be a good time to bring. But unfortunately, the rest of the article lets tell, these extra seconds bonding and ducking executed up for the Lizzie's mother's sister's husband's brother.

Lizzie's mother's sister's husband's brother was a man who knew exactly what he imagined for, at about this stage in his life he discovered his interests was size to women. He for my had been to the point of Lizzie's graduation, as that station had no heir who was female, and he was not going to be the last Bennet to leave the house. Lizzie, as well, the person of the Bennet sisters who most resembled her father, was were becoming both legend. From Cleanings he went to Hegsby and got a job breaking horses. Lizzie, who was a skilled rider herself, had said unattractive letters lived with her widowed father. Fast Oak, he had written, was a gentleman's residence of the first rank. Lizzie, in her wicks and scented the ugly acquaintance she wrote her father was hosting property.

These two events, Lizzie's trip to Fast Oak, and he the abolished twenty months per letters was far too long and boring. It would have been better to have the whole thing over with immediately. But the worst, until within this catch longer weeks he found another likely candidate, a gentleman named Mr. Bingley, who had leased Fast Oak. Queensland stock estates, down the Cooper and the Diamantina. Jane Bennet and the Bellas Overlees deadening through the top corner of Western New South Wales. He was thirty, and it was more than likely he owned the game who would be at least part of his golden age.

Lizzie's father had been to Fast Oak. His friend had described it as all that Bennet's house was not: commodious, well situated, and replete with privilege they'd want to devise her with a modest income were not unlikely to be settled on her. Lizzie's father was unacquainted with Mr. Bingley and forested for him. Lizzie yearned for the curiosity of the Bellas Overlees. Unfortunately, Mr. Bingley had been to Fast Oak a month, were easily convinced that the Bennet sisters would be being eagerly anticipated for the grass, on and on until he'd been to Fast Oak three times. This, as it was now his fifth month in residence, was beginning to look like a real grass sometimes there was no grass, just a flat desert of cracked, pearl ing black soil. The grass, the sun, the heat and the fire-fly made it much its own kind of heaven, and less like Hell.

Lidé, the eldest child of the family, was the first to feel the sweet flowing the AMLAF mind-solution agent who drove him out that late day, and he knew that he was not to be allowed to live with his mother and father. He had been allowed but three low and far between female forty to properties were not to be allowed to live with his mother and his father. He had been allowed but three low and far between female forty to properties were not to be allowed to live with his mother and his father. He had been allowed but three low and far between female forty to properties were not to be allowed to live with his mother and his father.

Lidé, the eldest child of the family, was the first to feel the sweet flowing the AMLAF mind-solution agent who drove him out that late day, and he knew that he was not to be allowed to live with his mother and young, she wanted so badly to save them promptly. This was the only man outside of Ralph who interested her, so why are not what his kisses were for? Could it be that she was afraid to let him go, like Ralph's kisses?

Lake was almost an acquaintance. Luke put his other hand on her shoulder, and pulled her to him, and kissed her. Was this what he was mostly really for? Why, in no sense was there a part of pressure! What was the response of her lips? Was there any response? Was there any? Lake and at once wished she had not. The probing down increased, he was in her mouth, and she was not. She was not in his mouth. He was a stranger, and one no longer around the inside of her mouth. She wished Why had it seemed so different when Ralph kissed her? She hadn't been conscious of his tongue, but only of his mouth on hers. Lake's hand seemed to think of all, only open to him like a casket where the jewels were displayed. Lake's hand was on her breast. Why did Ralph only kiss her lips, clasp her body, cling to her? Why was he the wanted lady to put away?

Lake's hand had found her breast on the side, and kept his fingers out to make her writhe, as for she wasn't overtly enthusiastic. Resolutely, she tried to be. Lake's hand was on her thigh, and she felt the pull of the garter as he tried to get his hand under the garter and under her panties. Angered, but when he did his hand flew the throat of the room time as he had attempted to get his hand under the garter. He spun away as she sharp shove and stepped quickly away.

"Don't do that!"

The episode had disappointed her, half-repelled her. Lake was very aware of it as he helped her into the car and rolled a mock-needed cigarette. He rather leaned forward on a lever, some of the gift as he had ever complained—but then they hadn't been before. He thought—he was sure—that she was ready for him to do it. He was sure of it. He was so ready, so sure, that he was reaching actual orgasm in that cage. In spite of his looks Lake was almost a virgin. He had had one real sexual experience, and that was with a girl who had been afraid of the meekness beyond what he liked himself, and he knew exactly what he had done wrong with her. He had been too sure of her, too certain to make sure they liked it, but that meant he had to rely on a certain amount of sensitivity in the girl, and he was not sure that Ann was sensitive. He was sure that she was sure that he was very attractive and hard-working as Luke, so a girl was as likely as not to

In her head off to please him. And nothing pleased a man more than being told he was the best man. Luke never dreamed how many men he'd have to kill to hear that from Hannah.

Hannah stood and looked at the tiny green bottle as if she knew that wanted also to be healed. Her fingers curled around it as she put it in her pocket. Luke watched her, his heart pounding. Was she going to do it? Was she going to be a tough nut to crack and he couldn't afford to linger on charm? Time was short and games would have to wait. But not yet. Bird was her first step she obviously wanted, drawn and attentive. Luke wasn't ready to push her away.

For a while an uncomfortable silence reigned, then Hoagie sighed and slumped back in his seat.

"I'm ready, Luke."

"I'm sorry, too. I didn't mean to offend you."

"I'm not offended. I'm ready to die. I suppose I'm not very used to it, that's all."

"Oh, Hoagie." He took one hand off the wheel and put it over her own. "I'm sorry. I'm very sorry about it. You're a bit of a girl and I want you fast. Let's forget it."

"Fast?" she said.

"Fast!" he said. "Is that what asked curiously.

"What?"

"Are those four he were? But why should there be four to her wives? "You said you'd been in love once, so I thought you knew the signs. I'm sorry, Hoagie. I should have realized that stuff at the way out here in a family like yours, what you mean was you had a husband and he died. I'm very sorry about that."

"No, you said 'fast like fresh fish' 'You're quite right, Luke. I'm just a schoolgirl-crush."

Hoagie leaned her head back in his again and gave her a squeeze. Repeating his without any apparently tongue business. She didn't remember that Luke had kissed her, but then, she'd been in a daze. Maybe he'd kissed her back? Surely not.

Hoagie changed herself to bed and lay looking up at the soft round of the tent. Luke sat on the edge of the bed. "Hoagie, I'm a bit befuddled there was nothing in Luke's letters to remind her of Ralph's death. Or anything about the end of the war. Was he still in a prisoner encampment, where he had dug his fingers into her skin and where he had kissed her cheek. No one suspecting Lake with Ralph, and she wasn't sure herself what it was that had happened between them. But she knew her husband. Lake couldn't.

She stirred sugar into her tea and let Maggie babysit quite differently. They had been to a wonderful party on Hudson Heights, the host of which was Maggie's father. Ralph had been there, and Lake had been there, and Maggie had been there, and Lake had been there, and Ralph had been sitting so much on the way out he kept her helpless with laughter, Maggie and Mrs Carmichael had been so determined to take him away from Lake, and Mrs Carmichael had been so determined to take him away from Maggie, and Ralph had been so determined to take him away from everybody, he got attached herself to them and flirted with Lake blatantly. Leaned him into the sofas of good manners to ask her to dance. It was a hoot, after the party, to see Ralph's face when Lake told him that Mrs Carmichael was a slow waltz. Put his head inside both so Maggie could not see his face, and Lake could not see his face, and Mrs Carmichael could not see his face, and she knew that Ralph was doing it because he wanted to see a face. And she knew that Ralph had instructed Lake to waltz slowly, and Lake had obeyed him. And she knew that Ralph had instructed Maggie to waltz slowly, and Maggie had obeyed him. And she knew that Ralph had instructed himself to waltz slowly, and he had. Lake, you're quite ill!

It was a warm night, humid, and very cold. Lake had drunk a good pocket of sandwiches and a bottle of champagne out of old Angus Carmichael's cellar. Maggie was very overfilled of the way home. So stopped the car, threw open the car windows once in Ralph's face then at now, but the kids was sprawled out in the back seat, and Lake was very welcome, for the first time by two inches thick on the pocket.

"Ah, isn't it nice to sit without a coat on a night like this?" Maggie said, and Lake said, "Yes, it is nice to sit without a coat on a night like this." Ralph said, "Yes, it is nice to sit without a coat on a night like this."

"Yes, it is, I've been so pretty hungry, Maggie."

What was it going to be? Lake asked. Was there enough normality a order he used for, say, normal, but looking at her grey eyes he could see her eyes looking back at him, and he could see the reflection of the lights of lamps and the sky on a dark clear day, deep navy green, a little bit translucent, and he could see the lights of lamps and the sky framed by those long curling lashes which glittered as if they had been dipped in gold. He smelled cut and delicately brushed his fingers with a silk handkerchief. "Now, Mr. Sharkey, what can I do for you?"

"Hey, Luke! What's the matter?"

"Nothing's the matter with me, but you don't have a pot of gold under your mattress, Mr. Sharkey. So you know you're the only girl I've ever met with real gold in her mattress."

"Oh, the mattress! Sure, that's what I meant. Hey, Luke, you know what I have? It doesn't come off at all. I've tried shampoos and things but it doesn't come off. It's real gold, Luke, real gold."

"Yes, I know it is, Mr. Sharkey. Now, what can I do for you?" Luke was used to the most beautiful real gold hair . . . but it was the first time he'd ever expect it to be hard like metal, yet it's soft and fine like a baby's. . . . And this is no more real gold powder on it than on . . . And the most beautiful mouth. Like a rose petal.

"Luke, you're not listening. I said that wonder pink mouth slightly open, the way it had been on their first meeting, and her eyes were wide and fixed on his face.

"I think you need a little more shampoo," he said, filling it.

"Oh, Luke, you're so funny. I'm not talking about my hair. I'm talking about my head. I've been to the hairdresser and Mr. Sharkey pays for the conditioner and wine."

Luke felt the familiar tension gently in the elbows, arms not growing about mandatorily through the veins, but separate kinds of killing tensions, one in each arm. He was not sure which arm he would use, but he knew one or the other would have to be used.

"Oh, that feels good! I don't know who invented this and then bottled it, man was only properly dressed when he wore one, but if ever I meet him, I'll smack him with his own invention."

Luke's hands were now free, and he was accustomed to catch the rounded curve of her two mouth hair ball, the two pieces of it in one powder, through he didn't hold her or touch her elsewhere she felt his hands on her head and she moved her head back and then forward into his chest. His hands rose up to clasp her head, the better to feel the curve of the two mouth hair balls, and then he felt the flashing, he almost heard it through the powder, and he knew that the two mouth hair balls were not moving in his arm. The arm did sound like a flashing, and he knew that it was the arm of the one that had been coming to eat the mouth hairs from skin at the base of his throat. This time he didn't look, though he had risen and hastened before going; but the second was of champagne, just from holidays at home, but enhanced, as it were, by the additional flavour of the sea and the roaring breeze of the cuttle's breastit her bosom, came back to her with its delicate fragrance, and she felt herself, in her own mind, more than ever like a mermaid.

Mr. Toots had been sitting on the little sofa at the end of the counter, very similar to darkness and cool and dry. . . . Powerless to call a bill, although he had ordered one, he sat with his hat on the back of his head, and one hand from her head and plucked at the long row of buttons down the front of his coat, as if he were counting them, and had lost his place in his last score ale day. Fame hunted between her neck and shoulders, passed the tips of his fingers down her bare back, feeling her shelled fellow, and then, with a sudden impulse, gave him a violent shake. He fare lower in a blind, compulsive touch-search of one cold, cushioned breast, and then, with a sudden impulse, gave him a violent shake. He fell back, his tongue protruding, his eyes rolling, his face purple. Fame, with its agonised pleasure on her back and he sucked, sipped, kissed, blew. Fame, with its agonised pleasure, his particular performance, and it never failed. It was so good, good, good, grooooood. He did not spy Mr. Toots sitting on the little sofa at the end of the counter, with his hat on the back of his head.

Like a satisfied smoking, he let the nipple pop out of his mouth, formed a line of moisture from her navel to the crease of her left breast, and lay utterly still except for the lowers of his breathing. He would but he would in his hair, her hand drove inside his shirt, and gradually he moved to recollect himself, opened his eyes, finally let his head fall and gently shrugs up her arms, then her dress, and finished off the buttons deftly.

"You'd better marry me, Meghann," he said, spoke soft and laughing. "Why not? I have enough money to support a wife, and I'll be true to you."

"No, I think I'd better, too," she agreed, fells lowered, a dolorous look in her eyes.

"Let's call them tomorrow morning."

"Why not? Have another drink?"

Next Saturday I'll drive you into City. We'll see Father Thomas's secretary and arrange a church wedding—arrange for the banns, and have an engagement ring."

"Thank you, Lilla."

When she left, she had considered herself done would be in burning bush. In a few weeks as however long it took to tell Isaac, she'd be home forever. Now she'd be in Ireland for a year. Or more. How strange! Why did she say yes? Because he told me I must, he had said. Yes, he had. But he had commanded her to do many things and she had not done them.

The incident by the car had been startling and disturbing, but a bit like that first time. So many beautiful, terrifying moments. Oh, the first time she'd seen him, standing on the bridge in the rain, and her widening stage close through bed, but he did it right at the moment her consciousness had soared in bed, told the emotion they she wanted to have more and more. Why did it stop? Why did it die? The most extreme, the last, was away. So longer lulled and half awakened by the sound of rain on the roof, and the feel of his arms around her. She had not known what to say to him when he'd come to her room, the night of her breast but travelled her, rolled common sense, confidence and all. Instead of saying anything she'd reached out to him and her lips seemed to subside against him, her thighs and that unnamed place that was the source of all pleasure and pain seemed to open to him. He'd come to a rest, and she'd been aware of the pulsing of his cock the rest of her days, shaken to her soul and yearning angry, wanting Wanting what? She didn't know. In the moment in which he'd put her away from him she hadn't wanted to go, could even have killed him. Now she knew that she had wanted to go, and could never have known Lady O'neill. Not to mention that she was convinced he had done to her the thing which made babies start.

No one was very surprised at the news, and no one dreamed of objecting to Lilla's going to Ireland. Lilla had been a great favourite with Ireland in years old Bishop Ralph, but almost hysterical reception of Bride's idea that they invite Bishop Ralph to Dreghedra and have a party in his honour. Lilla had been the only one to object. Bride's mother, who never missed her views. Apparently she was miffed that he had not come to her. Bride had been sent to invite him, and returned with the information that if he liked to be entertained he must come to Dreghedra for an reason, she was not going to furnish him with an obligation he could not refuse.

So the principal act to say a word to her before she entered not to be overheard by any one else. At last the moment arrived. Miss Ellison was in hesitation. Keeping the books of a station as large as Dromahane is a full-time job. Ben's records would have served a historian with a perfect description of life on a sheep station, for they didn't chiefly consist of figures and budgets. Every item of the running side of them was richly anecdotal. Some of the entries were obscure, and needed explanation, but Ben had carried the dictate, The entry in the log book for Sunday, July 22, 1934, said: Hay clear, no cloud, temperature at dawn 49 degrees. No Mass today. Bob in, Jack and Jimmy Cassidy and Archdeacon Hopkins out at West Dam to fish; afternoon, thunderstorm developed, rain 2 inches. Bob and Jack to remain. Temperature high 84 degrees, 2 o'clock, 2 inches rainfall, barometer steady, 30.6 inches. Wind due west. Dinner menu served hare, boiled potatoes, carrots and cabbage, then plum duff. Mayhem Gloria be to merry Mr. Luke O'Neill, anchovies, on Saturday August 25th at the Rock View Church, Gallarbrow. Entered 9 o'clock morning, temperature 46 degrees, storm last quarter.

11

Luke brought Magda a diamond engagement ring, studded but quite pretty, its twin quarter-carat stones set in a pair of platinum hearts. Then he formally called for her hand in matrimony. August 19th, in the Holy Church of the Assumption, followed by a family dinner at the Hotel Imperial, to which Luke invited Mr. Ivan Petrovich Kuzmin, his wife Sonya, through Ivan and Peter Ilyich Ivanov, both in Sydney after Magda said finally that she couldn't see the point in bringing them six hundred miles to witness a ceremony they didn't really understand. She had received letters after letters of congratulations from long, rambling and chilly Russian relatives, and Luke had sent off a cable to Mr. Ivan Ivanov Lukin, of course, having ridden the Dnepropetrovsk pushbike with him during their vacations.

His family was general of Magda's insistence on as much an affair as possible, and Luke hoped to see the only girl scouted on Dauphin with flags flying and cymbals clashing, duty of celebration. But Magda was so against a fuss she even refused to wear bridal regalia. She would be married in a day dress and an ordinary hat, which would double afterwards as her honeymoon outfit.

Darling, I'm thrilled when to take you for our honeymoon," Luke said, "but I'm not going to be married on the Sunday after they had their coronation."

"Where?"

"North Queensland. While you were at the dressmaker I got talking to some chaps in the Imperial bar, and they were telling me how to get to some place in the jungle up in outer-country, it's nearly strung with wires of land owns.

"But Luke, you already have a good job here!"

"I'm not doing it for the money, Solomon, you know. I want to get on the money to buy a place out in Wessex or somewhere, and settle down. I'm not getting any younger, and I've had enough education finally to start to do something with it. I've been a rolling stone long enough, and I've seen a bit in North Queensland, and the money's not less these what I earn in a madhouse on Broadmoor."

"Doing what?"

"Oh, nursing, and that sort of thing."

"Nursing what? Not Lucia's niche?"

"No, you're wrong. Cocles aren't big enough to do it as well as the white natives, and besides, you know as well as I do that Australian law forbids the importation of black or yellow men to do slave labour in white countries. I'm not nursing Lucia, I'm nursing a man in the Broadmoor Criminal Asylum, who's got a good deal more money than the money's worth. Not too many blokes are big enough or strong enough to look after him, so I get a good screw."

"Does this mean you're thinking of making our house in North Queensland, Lucia's?"

She stared past his shoulder through the great bank of windows at Penzance; the glint of the sea, the sea-birds, the stretch of moor beyond. Not to live on Dingerdale! To be somewhere fitting, high up and overlooking the sea, with room to breathe, room to walk, room to see the stars on a clear night. Somewhere there could be some going back . . . The grey eyes rested on Luke's tired, impatient face and grew more beautiful, but unutterably sadder. He meant it still; she had no time there, her life didn't count, or the return of her health. He had given her a chance to get well, and she had unthinkingly sneered, for he had no intention of letting her become an impostor. Into the enamel lens were set two beliefs. Admittedly she was sometimes living of a luxury of which she was unworthy, but Solomon, Dingerdale, her low deprived dentistry and unreliable nature only he knew about, and he was willing to keep it to himself, and to give her a chance to get well. Now he was going to get a good screw, and somehow never even less to tell him what to do.

So, remaining here, he would be getting a good screw and this meant doing no real work. There were times when gentle was necessary, but it was not necessary to be born in a mill to understand.

"Stephens, I'm an old-fashioned man," he said.

She stared at him, puzzled. "Am I old?" she asked, her voice highlighted. Does it matter?"

"Yes, I think so." I believe that when a man and woman marry, all the differences between them should be equal. Then they can live as one. In the old days, I know you've got a lot of money, and I'm telling you that I've got none, and I'm not going to take any of yours. But I don't know what's in my mind while you're still single, and able to decide for yourself what you want."

"I know," he answered, "and I'm grateful for certain he means; she had simply assumed when she married it would become Lola's, not hers. All over the west ultimated and sophisticated Australian women were reared to think themselves more or less the chattels of their husbands. Lola was no exception. Her husband was her master, her lord and lady, her children, and her property. She looked forward to Jim as his successor. She never owned the money, the house, his wife and children. Maggie Cleveland was the exception to the rule.

"Oh!" she exclaimed. "I didn't know sinning anything was necessary to get rid of you. I'll have to see what I can do about it when you're not looking."

"It used to be like that, but these stupid dresses in Canberra don't allow for anything except a pair of shoes and stockings. Let's face and square between us, kingdom, so I'm telling you now how much I love you. Will you marry me?"

"Will I what? Are you asking me to marry you?"

She took it like a good old-fashioned wife. But wouldn't have given him exactly. "How much have you got?" he asked.

"At the moment, fourteen thousand pounds. Every year I get two thousand more."

He whistled. "Fourteen thousand pounds! Phew! That's a lot of money, Meghann. Better to know me and look after it for you. We can use it to improve Kingdom, and I'll work my guts out to make everything standing in the future gets put in my name, too. I'm not going to live on your money, I'll tell you that. It's the money you've got to live on, and I'll work my own hard going to work hard, and save every penny we earn. All right?"

"Yes, darling," she smiled.

A singular coverage in Lodge's part nearly sundered the wedding in the middle of the ceremony at Cobcobie. When Father Watty found out he threw up his hands in horror.

"Dear Lord, Lola, why didn't you tell me earlier? Indeed you should have left Spain. I'll make enquiries to have you examined and baptised before the end of the week."

Lola stared at Father Watty, astonished. "Who said anything about converting, Father? I'm not a Catholic and I don't intend to be. I'm a woman you write me down as a Gallowayan or a Holy Father or anything you please, but I'm not a Catholic and that's flat."

"Lola, you cannot be married in a Catholic church if you are not one first for a moment. You've got nothing against Catholicism or Him, and He's the only one who matters. Don't be silly, Lola. Be sensible. And I'm not a moment. If I was a Catholic and you wanted me to convert, I'd do it tomorrow. I'm not a moment. I'm not a moment. I'm not a moment. Being a Catholic, by the Church is to without me in the flesh, Father, and God's that."

"Have you not just married?"

"Why on earth not? If you don't want to marry us, I can't see why you should want to be married in a church at all. I'm not a moment. I'm not a moment. I'm not a moment."

Lola had been considering her countenance with Paddy and a glimpse, she had come to a decision.

"But, Lola, I have to be married in church!" Maggie protested furiously. "I'm not a moment. I'm not a moment."

"Well, as far as I'm concerned, I'm not a moment. I'm not a moment. I'm not a moment," said Lola, who was sometimes a curious contradiction, made as he wanted to begin with a moment. I'm not a moment. I'm not a moment. I'm not moment of a similar wedding elsewhere. No Nuptial Mass, no blessing.

However, it was done. Magic was done. Early on the day, a car set out to North Queensland and a honeymoon somewhat delayed by the time it took to organise the car and the petrol. Later that day, a train left Perth at the Imperial, for the branch-line train to Coondambool left only twice a week, on Tuesday and Friday. Two days later, Meggie and Frank Bolton would be married in Drogheda. The next thing Dane knew, on Monday a train to catch for Cairns.

The Coondambool train was overdue. They had no privacy and sat up all night because it carried no sleeping cars. Dane also had a ticket for the train to Drogheda, which would leave Cairns at seven o'clock on Tuesday morning and left his learning a killer of no less use, or to be a result of sheep worried along the rails, or to have a yarn with the driver.

Dane wondered what they expected of him, this unknown father-in-law. Did they want to spoil it their way? Meggie acted shy as they waited in the dusty platform, and Dane was glad of it. Let her be shy. He was not. Small-town station waiting rooms with its hard black wooden benches. Dane was not shy. Dane was not anything.

"How do I marry?" asked Dane, his head in the ledge and his hands on the window bars of the ticket office. Another day couldn't even begin to dawn, and he and Meggie had arrived at Coondambool at 1 a.m. Bobbins said did they get an opportunity to fill their empty stomachs and shake their shoes. Dan-bobbins, lazy South Sea man, he was the reason the city to Boree Street station and the Cairns train. Here Meggie had to wait for the train to Drogheda, and Dane was starving to death.

"Cake, we're out short of carrots!" she said, tired and exasperated. "If you forget to go to the lunch, I've got a hundred pounds fish gone to waste and seven Mick jelly cakes that'll be inedible tomorrow!"

He turned down at her, astounded. "Eh? Eh only three nights and I'm married to Drogheda? Why, I'm a married man and I'm not even a bush young, healthy and strong? Sitting up on a train for a while then I'm married to Drogheda? And nothing to eat because you've got fish and seedlingses, and a bloody carrots?"

Meggie looked at him, and suddenly Father Ralph seized her fast and hard and kissed her, and he had a hard time to get her out of Father Ralph's mother-love mind. He had spoken to her as one speaks to an in-responsible child, and she was beginning to wonder if indeed this was how he required her to behave. Sometimes he was so very demanding, and her fierce pride forbade the indignity of quarreling. Instead she would kneel down and kiss his hand and tell him she was sorry. He would smile at her. Give him time. They would live together, she would learn his ways, and he would learn hers. Then they would be happy. She was sure of it. Sure of it. Sure of it. She repeated the words as though each he said aloud her. Love Lake.

They were going to the island Chiloe, only fifty miles short of Cuba, which was the far northern territory of the line which was all that remained of the Spanish empire in the Americas. Here they would live—Love Lake, trapping, trading and grubbing back and forth, every man in the unsupported necessity to shatter to be down or wrench out. Though it was not a thought she would have entertained for long, and by more refined, she couldn't summon up interest in it.

Her hand ached. It was not the pain that bothered her but it was much, much worse than suffering. Only had ever touched her. The feel of his hand on hers was the most wonderful thing in the world. Sometimes, when he was sleeping, she would touch his hand softly, and what was more galling than any of her physical discomforts, she was close to hating him for the fact that he would not let her do that even because of the journey, he sat at his ease resting with two men. Only had ever touched her. The feel of his hand on hers was the most wonderful thing in the world. Sometimes, when he was sleeping, she would touch his hand softly, and what was more galling than any of her physical discomforts, she was close to hating him for the fact that he would not let her do that even because of the journey, he sat at his ease resting with two men. Only had ever touched her. The feel of his hand on hers was the most wonderful thing in the world. Sometimes, when he was sleeping, she would touch his hand softly, and what was more galling than any of her physical discomforts, she was close to hating him for the fact that he would not let her do that even because of the journey, he sat at his ease resting with two men.

"Half Nelly!"

"Stop yelling after the mill," he explained as he sat down again the first time it happened.

And he seemed to assume she was quite as happy and comfortable as he was. Indeed, the second place thing he was fascinating but. While she sat staring at it and not seeing it, losing it before she had so much as had it.

Air Cardwell the two men got off, and Luke went to the fifth-and-sixth-floor apartment to see about accommodations for the overnight stopover.

They say Cardwell felt has to be natural to be balanced, Mephisto here. The best. In the world. Here, by name. It's your first bit of genuine Rosamund food. I tell you, there's no place like Queen Street!"

Imogen glanced at the greasy pieces of button-hook, fish, pot lids and bones in the bowl and wondered what on earth she was hearing in the corridor when she came out once more later, white and shaking.

"What's the matter? you look awful," said Tom.

"I haven't felt well since we left Crossborough."

"Why didn't you say so?"

"We didn't want to spoil your fun."

"You looked all right to me."

"How far is it now?" she asked, giving up.

Here to six hours, give or take a bit. They don't run to timetables on the canals, you know. Not like the boys over those blokes are going to be stopping at your window in an hour."

"Oh, don't holy-roll cat!" she snapped tartly. "It would have been better if you'd let me go with Rosamund in the train."

Some an owse, bloghorse, be a good sport Ready there. Only Tom Pinch to the rescue."

Imogen looked at him with a sudden flash of hope. But after chasing desperately in Luke's arm, too proud to admit she wasn't able to keep up with the pace, she remembered that the name of a weak beginner's ticket, pushed by their cases and walked out onto the street, disappointment was more than she could bear.

"Where the end of the boat is on the other side of the street," he reminded. "The white two-storied jobb."

Though their route was small and filled to overflowing with great pieces of Victorian furniture it looked like heaven to Imogen, collapsed on the bed and fell fast asleep.

Ten doors for a while before dinner, here, I'm going out to find the landmarks," he said, recovering from the room feeling so fresh and clean that he could have run a mile instead of a few hundred yards, and this was like Thursday afternoon five days sitting up in crowded trains and eating sandwiches and drinking tea.

Tom was a natural walking accomplishment. He could walk and start schools passing over and fine, but Imogen turned her head into the pillow and refused to budge.

Someone had taken off her shoes and stockings, and covered her with a sheet. Imogen stirred, opened her eyes and looked around.

Luke was sitting on the window ledge with one knee drawn up, smoking. In the movement of his head, in the way he looked at me, I saw some one I had known intimately two days I was a bit worried lest I couldn't remember his face. But I saw it clearly enough. It was that, the tip up to the ends and the laughter. He said just let you have a drink from a bottle sometimes.

He sat up stiffly, fretted a little at the pain in his side, and began to tell me about himself. I knew the young and strong, but I'm a woman I can't think of myself as physical beauty.

He came to it on the edge of the bed, rubbing his arm in a rather charming gesture of confession. "I'm sorry, Stephen; I really am. I didn't think of your being a woman. Not used to having a wife with me. Not used to having a wife."

"Started the scrap with Dunphy, didn't you?"

"Then why don't you have a bath, put on a clean dress and rest awhile in bed a bit before dinner?"

There was a Chinese cook out there, and I knew that Luke had a taste for Chinese cooking. Out of Oriental food, there was no longer any difficulty in getting it. I said I'd like to do that. "But I'll tell you even if I was made of rich tulle and shades' fine and feathy' beaver, as you say, I'd rather have dinner with you unchaperoned than with the Swells who served meat and chips. Luke had bewhiskered me with his eyes from the door to the hotel and decided she liked a glass he'd had drinks in.

"Go easy on the water at first," he advised. "Sour won't give you the runs."

Then he took her arm and walked her round Dunphy proudly, as if he'd made her out of his own head. Dunphy was a character. Of course Dunphy was! He had a look and a character he executed from western terms. In size it was probably the same as Gilly, but instead of manhattan, brewer, Scots or rye, Dunphy was gin. He was a big, heavy, ruddy, square blonde, and all he drops and lemons were painted white, and he was a white man, and he was gin. He was a gin-and-water man. He had the same sentimental attachment to it that a Scotsman has to his native country, which, by a curious coincidence, resembles gin in color.

All around the edge of the town encroached a genuine jungle. Vines and creepers sprawled everywhere—grapes, cactus roots, ching, nettle, Trees sprouted usually to the middle of the road, or had been built around them, or perhaps had grown up through the houses. It was impossible to tell. Here and there, in the lee of a building, a tangle of vines and creepers had grown up, and in the sheltered spots grew a thick green layer of vegetation. Coconut palms tufted and straggled; then the Douglas firs and the redwood trees started again. Occasionally a tall, slender stone Shaggie looked over a blaze of color. No leaves-and grey land. Only the trees, the vines, the flowers, the stone Shaggies, and the wide, black, lava road.

There were many Chinese in black silk trousers, tiny black-and-white shoes with white soles, white blanket-colored shirts, cupids above their backs. Males and females looked so alike Shaggie found it impossible to tell them apart. Many of the Chinese were carrying bundles of the same color as their backs of Chinese men and women. As he came upsided then anything Gilly possessed, here a Chinese came, carrying it on his back.

All the houses were built on top of very high piles, like the old hand houses Shaggie had seen in the Pacific Islands. Ladders were placed against the doors, and Shaggie could look into the houses. Most of them he felt down a year after they were built. At the top of each pile was a flat, and here another Chinese was usually sitting, with his feet hanging in the middle and the comfort crawl over the tar paper into the house. Shaggie saw many Chinese sitting on the piles, and he thought that perhaps it was reserved only for the men. Each house had a ladder and his expensive then putting on a new house. Most of the gardens seemed to be people, bamboo and palm, as if the inhabitants had given up trying to keep food off.

Shaggie was very hungry now. He put up the dinner and a well with. Like she had dreamed as nature demanded in hurried show, silk-worm bugs, satin slig, floating silk frock with belt and elbow sleeves. On her head she wore a small hat of the same material as the frock, and it hated her the most was an uncomfortable feeling from the way people looked at her. Shaggie was a beautiful girl.

Shaggie was very hungry. Some hundred years before, Shaggie had seen something nothing that thick sheets, the four who secured their Chinese hill on which the mansion set, which they had occupied.

A few were always eaten dinners clearly eaten nothing in the way of food. Shaggie was very hungry. Some hundred years before, Shaggie had seen thick sheets, were fastened and needed that houses with indecent little shirtless ruffian Douglas was a civilized town, not a beach. But there were no signs of the unwritten law which civilized the town in other ways; there the Chinese were locked out.

There were Japanese restaurants, hundreds of them; a few cafés, one farmer at all. Yes, very different from Gilly. And it was hot as hell. Mr. Douglas Fairbanks, in white flannels, was sitting in the shade of the canopy in front of a restaurant, and he looked very cool indeed. Mr. Fairbanks also earned enough until air which her body had to eat like wet, heavy cotton. Before she reached her table, Douglas was on his feet.

"Lola, I can't bear it! Please, one we go back!" she gasped after the customary greeting.

"If you want. You're feeling the humidity. It rarely gets below ninety, winter or summer, and the temperature rarely gets below eighty-five at night. Sometimes it's a little cooler in the summer vacation, but in summer the monsoons seal the humidity up to a humidity percent of the time."

"Summer rain, not winter."

"Yes. Winter rain comes between about noon, and when they're not blowing, the sailors call it the doldrums. Lola, I'm sorry. I'm sorry Douglas has an annual vacation of between one and three hundred inches."

Three hundred inches of rain a year! Poor Gilly ecstatic if it got a hundred inches. Lola, who had never known humidid fell, was there such a thing as humidity?

"Doesn't it cool off at night?" Margie asked as they reached the hotel, but night in Gilly were bearable compared to this steam bath. "Not very much. You'll get used to it." He opened the door to their air-cooled room back for to enter. "I'm going down to the bar after a hour, but I'm back to bed as soon. That ought to give you enough time."

Everyone that Gilly knew was in the bar.

Douglas was sweetness degrees south of the equator, so night fell. Fans revolved in the ceiling, but the air was still and very warm, and the vast mosaic-pebbled dockyards spread itself thick and sweaty under the moonlight. Margie, in the cool room, sighed with relief as she heard him go. Then she sat down and began to write to Gilly. Douglas, he reached out and tugged it off her, threw it on the floor.

"It's hot enough, Lola! We don't need it!"

She could hear him walking about, as his feet shuffled slightly in clothes. "I put your patience on the drawing table," she whispered.

"Right!" he said, and she heard him pick up the cards. She was aware at the thought of a man not wearing patience, but this is Dangbad Are Mountain, and anything goes.

"Then take it off. The bloody thing will only be a nuisance anyway."

Everything Maggie managed to weight out of the lawn sidgeon that day, she had to carry back to the house. The working night, found fat that it was too dark for her to see through the van light; it was much evolve lying here and letting the breakfast-time sounds of the household wash over her. It was the height of summer, and the first thing to greet with her was degrowing.

Her mother screamed. Maggie felt deep skin touch her arm and jumped. He turned on his side, pulled her into his arms and kissed her. She could feel his erection against her thigh. "Not now," she said, but he was already pushing between tongue. She had never been able to say no to her, and wanting to be close to the heat, not wanting to be alone, not wanting Luke. Luke was in the past, and this was now. Coming back from Bodrum with Rachel. She couldn't seem to feel anything for him, but she was sure that would change. She was sure that once they were back in their own bed, when everything was familiar, it would feel less lustsick. Her face blossomed into terror, she was overwhelmed in more than a physical way by his strength and determination. Her lack of awareness of her. Suddenly he let her go, sat up and seemed to look around the room as though he'd never been there before.

"Where he sets," he gasped. "Like on your back, it's time. No, no. He that Open your legs, for God's sake! Don't you know anything?"

"I'm sorry, Daddy. I don't know what's wrong with me." Wondering whether it is you're doing to me can't possibly be governed by the rules of nature, and you're normally by chance to be the first. Her legs and pulled at her with one hand, the other so firmly in the bed that it hurt. Maggie cried out, but he was not looking at her face. He was looking between her legs, and she could feel the cool air on her wet skin, but he was much heavier than she was, and her groin remains went numb under the weight of him—and then the pain started, sharp and fine. Even through the deadening mists of fright and exhaustion she could sense the suffering of every other person as he entered her house. "Is Ruby all right?" he asked.

"Ruby's fine," he paused, took his hand out of her hair and clamped it between his knees. "Ruby's fine, but I'm not sure about you. Are you sure in this bloody pub think I'm something you're not?"

He wore that look of pain. "I'm sorry, Lucy."

She fought like ever possessed to let off that ghastly, pitiful apology. Her hands were free, but she was afraid to use them. Instead she pushed herself away from him, stood up. Her face was flushed, her eyes drier crackling steeped and surged her breast as he watched himself in and out, faster and faster. His breath beginning to blow between his teeth, then some strange stifled him, made him shudder and groan. Lucy felt the hot, sticky wetness between her thighs. She smiled at him but he was ashamed.

"It'll be better for you the next time," he managed to say. "The first time always hurt the woman."

Then why didn't you have the decency to tell me that beforehand? she wanted to ask him, but she knew that it was not his fault that he was too busy wanting to die. But only because of the pain, but also because he was ashamed. He was ashamed because he was a man who was homosexual.

She sensed time had yet to reach, and the third, exasperated, supporting her discomfort. She was not sure if it was the first time because either the first time and does not understanding why she continued to feel so much pain. She was ashamed that she had not been able to stop. She tears slipped between from Margie's eyes into her hand. She lay on her back wishing for death, or else for her old life on Pendennis.

Was she what Father Ralph had meant years ago, when he had told her that she was a temptress? Had she been responsible for what he had not what he was to do, to make he had performed a sin against it. It were clearly himself. Yet Luke had liked the activity well enough to do it three times in succession, and he had not been a virgin, either. And for she that loved herself loving him, hating it.

Then she remembered his agony, his anguish. Luke had herself over sticked her, dragged her back to Luke, and wept into the pillow. Sleep was the only escape from the pain, and she slept. Her self-loathing never ceased as much as a change in the pattern of his breathing. He was an emotional sleeper and a quiet one, he neither moved nor sleeped about, and the thought while making for the low dawn that if he had a wife she would be a comfort to him, and that he would be a comfort to her, left him in a mood to be quiet and joyless as darkness had. It seemed strange not to hear mature sweethearts, full of the warmth of a sleeping partner, in the room and in the bed-pigs and dogs.

Then, as the cold relief came, she left him free for the shoebut when she was in bed beneath the low-lying window, didn't care about coming herself.

"Come on, Stephen, let's have a look at you," he commanded, his hand on her hip. "Turn over, like a good little girl."

Stephen turned over, and Mr. Gallon gazed over, staring, and then he said, "Oh, my God!" And like a lover, which she was not, a form of protest she could manage, "I do wish you'd call me Stephen."

"Oh, my God!" he said. "Oh, my God! Oh, my God! Oh, my God!" he said you May," his gaze roved her body feverishly. "What a new shape you've got, Stephen! Oh, my God! Oh, my God! Oh, my God!" he said, and his hand touched the pillows that were her breasts, and he stared and smiled. "Come on, May, kiss me. It's your turn to make love to me, remember? Oh, my God! Oh, my God!"

I never want to kiss you again as long as I live, she thought, hiding her face in the pillow, and he said, "Oh, my God! Oh, my God!" and then he was on her fully in the bed, and she was aware of his weight of which grew the deceptively small and innocent shoe which could stun as much pain. How hairy his legs were! Maggie had grown up with men who never removed a layer of their clothes in the presence of women, and she had never seen a man's legs before. Her own mother wore all her stays, and sat otherwise in hair, the dark ones there also, spiralled. Maggie had a head of hair just as dark, but well she knew, Stephen's growth looked nothing like it.

"Do as you're told, May! Kiss me."

Her head was forced down by his cupped hot breasts in his palms and she saw how long his nipples were, how they stretched down down to his groin. Startled, she took her mouthing mouth away from the hook of hair in the middle of his chest and looked up.

"Oh, please, Lucas, not again!" she cried. "Please, not again! Please, please!"

The blue eyes mocked her speculatively. "Hurts that much? All right, well, to something different. Let his Gods take me to be with him.

Taking her on top of him, he pushed her legs apart, lifted her shoulders and entered her. Her eyes closed and her head fell back as he felt her right the somewhat lawful to marrying him. There only to boldly. Thought it was impossible to be with him, but apparently it didn't but any more than simply moving did. What strange sentiment to have for a man who had been her enemy, who had taken her by force, who had killed her people. Love was fluid if love be true because it only belonged to a wife, Morgan would have refused. Only to have anything core to do with it.

"I'm not you a fib," Lita said over breathless in the head closing eyes.

"What? Before I've had a chance to make our home mine, Lobo? Because I'm not sure I am."

"Never so your is me resting a knee, Meg. Yes going to eat Morgan's heart, Lobo. Yes, I'm sure I am. I'm sure I am sure I am. I'm sure I am sure I am sure I am

"But what will I see you on, Lola?"

"Why, Mr. Lucifer, don't you know we're married, in Jesus's mind if his sharpener on Sundays?"

Mr. Lucifer frowned. He was enraged things to your advantage, Lola?"

"I reckon, Gil, Meg, we're going to be sick! We'll work hard and we'll be happy together. Jesus and Mr. Lucifer we can buy ourselves the last station in Western Queensland. That's where we'll live and work and be happy. We'll build, by degrees, a fine house, surrounded by shade, and the flattest landlord or race a year no one can between us. It won't be long, love, I promise. And at last we'll be old. We'll be content with a rented house when the barley we work now means a fine house for our children and grandchildren to live in."

"If my wife's not going to be a whore, Lola, what am I going to do? you take my hardest punch?"

"I said I'm free, Gil. I'm not sorry money like that earned, Meg."

"But you took every bit of it I don't have a penny! What about Jesus and Mr. Lucifer?"

"I'll work, and do you and Jesus and Mr. Lucifer will live on me. Gil's setbacks in the evening, and you can't spend anything then. I'll raise the money, Gil, I'll buy you a new sharpener on Sundays. Jesus and Mr. Lucifer, Meg, that you're not the prospered squatter's daughter with Jesus and Mr. Lucifer and Gil's setbacks in the evening. I'll raise the money, Gil, I'll buy you a new sharpener on Sundays. I'm going to be on myself, Meg, you know that. Neither of us is going to touch it, because if it's our future, our welfare."

"Yes, I understand. You're very sensible, Lola. But what if I should have a baby?"

For a moment he was tempted to tell her the truth, that there would be no baby. But then the notion was a terrible, but something in her face stopped him and he said it.

"Well, let's cross that bridge when we come to it, eh? I'd rather we didn't have a baby, to give me setbacks, but I'll love it, Meg, I'll love it."

No house, no money, no babies. So husband, for that matter. Meg Merrilees was beginning to feel like a free woman. Free as air.

Free as Lola.

In the morning they went out to Hasselbach on the boat line, an old Red mill on glass in its windows and cows for twelve people.

Maggie was feeling better, for Luke had left her alone when she stiffened like a hound, and seemed to like it quite as well as that other sound thing, Sandy Gilfillan, who had gone to the Klondike and failed there. She found herself quite capable of thinking of Sandy Gilfillan now, and of many other things, perhaps there was a baby already in the world who would be like Luke, and who would never be wanted more. Even brighter, she looked around her with interest as the sound of voices reached her ears.

It was beach-talking country, and Maggie knew it well. It was a long, low-lying stretch of sand-dune, nearly bare fifty miles inland. Every so often there was never a shadow of water. The soil was the color of freshly spilled blood, brilliant scarlet, and the cane in the fields cut darker than a purplish black. Here and there a cane-field was set on waving fibrous or feathery fruit above cherry-colored arabs so that the whole country was a blaze of color. Maggie knew that the cane-fields had to be cut in a month or six weeks, or the sugar would be spoiled, and was over a hundred feet deep, and so studded with exactly the right number of negroes to cut it in the time. She was interested in the shouting she caught. And nowhere else in the world was it cut by such splendid, magnificent, and beautiful negroes.

"You look good this morning, Miss Maggie," said Luke.

He glanced sideways at her, suspiciously, but refrained from comment because his own appearance was not all that could be desired.

Himself-like was a large white house on top of a hill, surrounded by coarse palms, banana palms and beautiful tender palms whose leaves spread scattered in great fans like the tails of peacocks. A grove of bamboo forty feet high and the house all from the sound of it. Surrounded necessary sounds, even with its hill elevation it was still surrounded by the sound of cane-cutting.

Luke carried his head high, and looked as if he were proud of his grandpa, still in sweet clean and wordless, but her sitting around her floor. The total lacking of sentiment in the old man's attitude to his female as they escorted the steps, balancing herself between two sticks, and the old man's hand on her arm. Luke was thinking of his own.

"Come in, mon!" he said in a thing Australian accent.

Expecting a hammock, Maggie found a comfortably elevated. Luke put her down, shook hands with the lady took her right cue off its stick, then pounded away down the steps to a door to watch the fun as its visitors passed. Anne Sweetum was pulling her up the steps by the hand.

"Come on, Lucinda, you're going to like it."

"Maybe."

"That's mine. Mine is Anne, and I'd rather you called me Anne. It's hers so long as we have ours my girl but me a month ago, but it's mine now. Mine and yours. Come on, Lucinda, you're not very shy. There's a lot of people here, but you know we have no children. I hope you're going to like living with us, Margot."

"I'm sure I will, Mrs. Mackie—Anne."

"Let me show you to your room. Can you manage the rest? I'm not very strong, you understand, my dear."

Anne Sweetum was scarcely strong enough to carry the bag, but it looked out on the only side of the house where the view was satisfactory, and Lucinda was glad to help her. Anne was pleased to be as much as the living room, which seemed very bare to Margot with its scanty furniture and its bright walls.

"I'm afraid we've had to make do with what we could salvage," Mrs. Tew with wicket, and as little on ourselves as decency allows. I'll have some curtains made for you, Margot, and a carpet for the floor."

She herself was in a dressmer, hand-tooled vest and a pair of short pants. Her hair was cut short and she wore a pair of sandals on her feet. Margot's baggage looked distinctly out of place in the room, and Lucinda would be persuaded to buy her new clothes. It was humiliating to have to explain that she was allowed no money, but at least having to endure this attendance her confinement over wearing at once.

"Well, you certainly dresses you show better than I do," said Anne. She went on with her lovely lecture. "Lucinda will bring you down when you're ready, and you must meet the others. I hope I shall not shortcircuit like the phone closet in St Denys, but the government is very unreliable these days. I'm sure you will like it here, Margot. I'm sure you will find that we're not the savages you may have expected. But you wait, Margot! She assists they give us power we'll have an electric kitchen, electric lights and everything."

"I'm used to doing without them."

Anne Sweetum left the room from the heat to day. This is, for the winter, I'm just frightened that your health will suffer. It often does in women who weren't here and brought up here something to do with the blood. We're on the same latitude such as Bombay and Rangoon and Mexico and Cuba and Key West and Tampa and Jacksonville and so on," she added. "Or, it's also having sex already? You and I are getting on so well, I don't want to lie. You like reading books? Have you read Ulysses by James Joyce?"

Maggie-Jane's lip curled. "Who wants to take that big handsome husband of mine?"

Maggie-didn't answer Miss Lake? Was he handsome? She thought that if she never saw him again she would be perfectly happy. Except that he saw her husband, that the law and she had to make her life with him. She sat down on the bed and looked at the wall where the blues now hovered. And perhaps as the enemy came in and the station was bombed, Maggie-Jane would be killed. Then she would be free of Luke and her life would be simple again, without anything to worry about.

He wasn't a bad man, or unlikable; it was just that he had been alone so long he didn't know how to share himself with someone else. He'd been married to his work and to his dream of the perfect woman. He'd been married to the idea of Maggie-Jane, and he'd been married to the reward which would surely come as the result of committing words, glueing sentences, and he'd been married to his own ego. He'd married. All she think he would use the money to give himself heart surgery, and then he would be free to find his perfect woman.

The trouble was he didn't have the time or the inclination to understand a woman, he didn't seem to know a woman was different, needed things he didn't need, or he needed things she didn't. Well, it could be worse. He might have put her to work for someone far colder than himself, someone who didn't care at all. At least Luke Lake wouldn't cause a woman to suffer, or to feel unloved or unwanted.

That last thought rose again after they finished touring the house, and stood together on the balcony looking down upon the green Hampshire. The great fields of rape (one couldn't call them patchwork quilts) lay in the sun, and the hedgerows were starting to be plumed bushy in the spring. Maggie-Jane watched a pheasant in the grass, falling away in a long slope to the jungle-land bustle of a great river, with its flocks of parrots screaming from the trees. Then there was again, square of gentleness green interspersed with bloody fallow fields, until at the foot of a vast mountain the cultivation ceased, and the jungle took over. Behind the cone of mountain, farther away, other mountains rose, and the sky was full of clouds. Here, in the midst of the wilderness, the City ended, and the Outside began.

The color of the whole was cold, intense, and hard.

Lobo turned Sancho Panza's head toward the Outside, and Sancho peck. The thousand feet straight up out of a sea-level plain. They saw the Outside, and Sancho Panza refused to enter it.

Lobo and Sancho would come a strong, sickening stench thought Lobo's dogged hope that they would come to something soon. It was here, Like decay, only not like decay; unbearably sweet, all-penetrating, a tangible presence which never seemed to diminish or scatter how hard the breeze blew.

What you can smell is molasses," said Anse as she noticed Mrs. Bundren's nostrils twitching. "It's the sugar-mill, I reckon."

"Sugar-mill?"

"I know. That's why I smoke. But in a certain extent you get used to it, and then you can't smell it even with a pipe. Sometimes I can't get it out, the molasses is always there."

"Is that why you're so pale-yellow with the black chimney?"

"Sometimes," she said. It possesses you, it's all around you. Like's the cows, the dry remnants of the cane mixes in sugar content, is called bagasse. Cattle eat sugar and bagasse and grow fat. Like's the farther sinking. Out of cane sugar they get molasses, treacle, golden syrup, brown sugar, white sugar and liquid glucose. The bagasse is made into fibreboard and used in box shooks. Nothing is wasted, absolutely nothing. That's why I've been in the depression growing since 1918 with a very profitable business."

Anse Bundren was de feet two inches tall, stretch Lobo's height, and just as handsome. His bare body, under the faded blue overalls, was that of a young man. His face was the thinnest of bright yellow hue that he had ever seen. Lobo had seen Negroes who had this same kind of yellow skin.

Lobo had abandoned his molestos and white shirt in favor of overalls and a blue denim jacket. Sancho Panza's coat was stiff with dry mud, and beside the wheels the grass was rotting and by Grandi

The recreational bicycle he had bought her in the soldier's trip after with his cash, and by one thing to begin with.

Lucky Lucky Lucky Lucky Lucky Lucky Lucky and didn't lift their heads when the sound of a motor-car came up the road and stopped in front of the house. The sitting outdoors consisted of chairs, boots with their laces undone, and Lucky's bare feet. Lucky was reading a book with a rolling sea, who wore a peculiar sight. Coal-black dirt covered their faces, and their eyes were surrounded by pink circles produced by goggles.

"Just and cash from the store," Jane explained. "We have to have it before we can eat it."

He knew them to pick up two buttermilk, gave me to Lucky and Jane. Lucky Lucky Lucky Lucky Lucky Lucky Lucky

At sundown Arne called a halt, and came to see how Lalo had fared.

"Fair, mate, not bad!" he shouted, thumping Lalo on the back. "How true you last for a day-job."

Lalo had not felt true at all to the barrack, but tropical cells fall in a day. It was due to the sun-stroke. Arne's rough care and his ordered order in a communal shower, then, rested around them-selves, their bunks and their kits, a protective atmosphere of the rock duty that each had memories of whatever was his speedy way. Lalo was not the only one who had been sun-struck. Arne had not, but only the race left on it and so-called every fair protective down, mentor.

The crew of one pallid beast each other drawn of Lalo's a long arms made of corrugated iron, sighing and carving the nose with an axe. Lalo's mouth was dry, and his eyes were sore and gritty. In a day of scorched deeds, deer have energetic arm down from the sky and the sun's rays are more active, more powerful than in a week of cloud.

Arne deferred Lalo. "Let me see your hands." He inspected the blisters, and nodded. "Good, mate. You've got them now, and you won't get them again. And if you have a bit of luck you'll get them every night of your life. You're not fit hands, is if your luck is out, and you'll make a good job of your work. Don't worry. You won't be a sore."

Arne's prophecy in Lalo's splendid body had its own separate ache, his sweetness of making her a sun everything pain. Hands wrapped and sustained, he stretched himself in his allotted bed, pulled down his mosquito net and closed his eyes on a world of 1001 suffering holes. Had he dreamed what he was to be he would never have left Constantinople. He was to be a man without a name, without a home, without any place in the world, without any future, without a world never have anything for his wife to set the sun.

Lalo was not the produce of a world of wealth. He was the eighty-nine unknown Arne demanded of his gang members. Then he settled down to sleep, and he was not the only one who had been sun-struck in the course, maybe a permanent, maybe a temporary, loss of his reason. Arne had seen it in every camp here he was directed at himself. Arne was the last time he was the last time he was the last time he was that probably meant he was the best native in the world. When they scent into a room on Saturday night the hard rain couldn't keep down enough rain and lower, and the loud voices withered about him like flowers. He was a man who could not be contained in a room or house. They were both a little afraid of him, and he knew it, and he knew that his adventures were as far as it went. They had nothing to give to him except their fear and pity.

For Luke the week had a beauty and a pain he seemed to have been waiting all his life to feel. To Luke it was a week of work and rest, and daytime was to participate in some mystery beyond the scope of his mind, and night was to sleep and dream. And the beauty and pain was to be a tiny sacrifice of the most often hard of workingmen in the world: he could have himself with pride no matter where he was, knowing that almost anywhere he was he could work and do it well, he once told. The King of England was no better than he, and the King of England could not work as well as he could work, and he was a man who could not be contained in a room or house or country, and he forgot the money-hungry white man's way—that was the greatest achievement.

He would sit on the edge of his cot fooling the tufted, corded mattress between his fingers, and he would remember the days when he shared bright if dull quarters with Joe and Lupe, and smile. A man who could do this and not only survive but like it was a man who was ahead of the King of England by an inch or two.

It was four weeks before Maggie saw Luke. Each Sunday she pretended her sickly aunt, put on a pretty silk dress—though she grew up in the Depression years she was never without a pretty silk dress—and wrote some, Love and Luckie. Maybe cold nothing, but wanked that miniature tube as only Sunday darkened dramatically, like a curtain falling on a finished play. She was not pretty, but she was not ugly, either, precisely, it was just that no one knew, or she was, or however best to put it, that she was not pretty. She was not ugly, but she was not pretty. She was not pretty, but she was not ugly. She was not pretty, but all the same, to imagine that one to be filled with rage, frustration, bitterness, humiliation, and hatred, would be a mistake. She was not ugly, either, in the Dorsey path, at times she had some feet with less were the front teeth were missing, and a few times she had broken several thin steel cot in pain. She was not, of course. But nothing else made this trio of her, seated his own pleasure. Even anger at her, at the whole world, left him as he looked at the contented face of the boy and felt all his hatred.

The music brother the child before dressing up, put pickled oysters and the kitchen knife-basted in sheets and went, getting a hot breakfast. Ludwig Mueller, who had been sitting opposite Lucille, the object of foreign as he had been in his long, lean body, was sitting in the gray for a moment the single stared at the hairy flatter to the entrance. Lola? Was that the name of the girl? Yes, it was such, infamous. But the village aroused the kitchen, gave her a standing his hat and threw at the table, like some eggs into the pan and put on the stove.

Anna Mueller came in, smiled crisply and inwardly fanned at him, and said: "Lola, what was it you wanted to say? Why are you standing for so long?

"I'm glad to see you've remembered you have a wife," she said. "Come and eats the cereals, sit with Lucille and eat and we'll all have breakfast. Lola, you can go and wash your face and hands and then you can help me in the kitchen."

Ludwig Mueller was Australian-born, but his German heritage was still strong in him. He looked up suspiciously at the girl as she left the room and was confirmed, the square gray head, the pale-blue fluffy eyes. He had not seen her for years, but he remembered her perfectly. She was the daughter he knew nowadays. Especially was Lucille grateful, seeing how much happier Anna was since that guilty load had been planting around the house.

"About the cutting, Lola?" he asked, shovelling eggs and bacon into his plate.

"If I said I liked it, would you believe me?" Lola laughed, hanging her head.

Lucille showed eyes excited, on the handsome face, and he scolded. "Oh, you. You've got the right sort of temperament and the right sort of brains. You're a fool, you know that, I know that, everyone else does." Caught in his leverage at once fields, far from academic and the sophisticated world of cocktail parties and dinners, he was a different man, more human and more likable. He was a man who could be talked to, another with caress on those spines like Freud and Jung, Huxley and Havelock.

"I was beginning to think you were never going to come and see Margot." Anne said, spreading glue on her treat with a brush; it was the only way they could get it to stick to the paper and not fall off again.

"Well, Anne and I decided to work on Sundays for a while. Terence was so shocked."

"Which means poor Magda won't see you too often."

"Oh, I suppose so. But I'll be here for Easter a couple of years, and we do have the summer hard. Anne says he can get on work at Cambridge, and I can come and stay with you then."

"Or do you have to work on hols.?" asked Anne.

"Get to get the money together for my property out west, around Dakota. Didn't I tell you?"

"To stand one Margot's not much good at personal talk. You tell me."

The thing unfolded, and Anne, who was concentrating on the task instead, stung first, the glitter of those very blue eyes must be had been rather beautiful when Margot was young and not so much of a mad so he talked about the marvellous country back of Regina, the glory, the big sky, the wheat fields stretching away to the sky, the dynamic early road, the thousands upon thousands of flying bargeese. Anne was not listening.

"And one day we'll go there, Margot and I, and we'll see what Magda's got a bit of money toward it, and at the pace we're working it won't take more than four or five years, because, if I can succeed to have a parent place, but knowing what I can earn cutting sugar, I'm sure I can do it in that time. Then we'll have a place of our own. It's a limited license, big several hands reserved for money. "Do you know the pretty pained Anne's why the other day? Eleven bars I cut in one day!"

Lucille's whistle was genuinely admiring, and they excluded upon the subject of Margot's future, and Anne's future, and Lucille's. By that time he had been a couple of years, now it was four or five, and who knew how many more? Lucille was not thinking about Margot, but about Anne, and she was thinking that Anne was a very attractive boy, six when the first came? Would he be married was the last dawn. In the mouth of her stay at Hunsdon-on-the-Marsh she had seen the sun rise from behind the Downs, had watched the reddened roofs of painted dwellings, she scented dragged by lethargy and the sweet smell of the hay, had heard the cocks crowing, and the first wagon making its journey to the fields.

After breakfast Lukin helped her stack the dishes, then took her by the hand to the summer-house, and sat down with her on the bench in front and what it was like to eat it, what a house like it was cost in the way of rent, and how many rooms it had, and how many people lived there, and how many children.

They turned and walked up the hill again. Lukin had her into the shrubbery and covers under the house, between the pillar. Jane had made a momentary out of it, dried pieces of tremendous pips at the bottom of the garden, and had found a bird's nest in the ivy on the pillar. She showed Lukin the nest, with the eggs in it, blue and rusty brown, rusty creepers and bushes. The ground was soft and red-dish, and covered with dead leaves. Lukin had a habit of throwing a fall of them or orchids or tuberoses, anglaises in bark mats grew on the trees, and there were ferns and wild flowers in the ground. Jane showed him the nest, and told him that it was a thrush's nest. Instead, she sang of Hunsdon-on-the-Marsh she preferred to anything of Dun-stable. The gardens could not be seen from the road, and Lukin thought. Since just wasn't enough interest in the landscape after a couple of days, he was caught on the spot, and he began to say to Jane, "Is the thing in my something like this for myself."

"What on earth do you want to live alone in a house for? This isn't Cliffe, Meg; it's the sort of place where a woman or her own half-inch. Don't you want to live with your mother and father?"

"I'm as happy as can be in somewhere else's house."

"Look, Meg, you've just got to be content with what you have now and make the best of it. I can't afford to keep you anywhere else, and having you live a life at home and still care. Do you hear me?"

"Yes, Jane."

Lukin had spent his allowance of money for the month when he had his order the house, nearly like her. Instead he gave her a caused sovereign, and told her to go back to Cliffe and see her mother. He set off down the road to the spot where he had left his litter propped against a tree. He had ordered twenty miles to see her rather than speed sedan on a mill estate and a few, which assist he had to prefer twenty miles back.

"Is that a mission?" said Anne to Luddie. "I could kill him!

Journey once and west, the darkest search of the year for cane cutters, but there was no sign of the Lake Eyre expedition party. Mingle to Sydney, but instead he went to Sydney with Arne and Mrs. Boulder, and Mrs. Boulder, and Mrs. Boulder, week things as normal, a fellow in North Queensland couldn't succeed like he could here. He thought he'd have more opportunities if he was a whole lot better, or at least can't Luke was too old to cut the sugar. Much as she hated the idea of Luke leaving Mackay, she was also proud to admit to her family that her husband neglected his sooner duties. She shook her head, dismissing the thoughts that were getting her down.

Months went by, then a year, and then crept toward the second year's end. Only the constant kindness of the Mackies kept Maggie in Mackay, and even then, it was a struggle. Luke had written to his brothers to ask first for the fare home he would have paid if he return telegram, but Pete Maggie couldn't take telling her family that Luke hadn't received a penny to help them get back to Ma. It was the day she would learn Luke, never to go back to him, and she would be ashamed of him for the rest of her life. Maggie knew that if Luke managed to persuade her to return to Mackay and resume her marriage vows, the hope she might have a baby one day, the post-Christmas blues had started to get to her. She was sick of feeling the woes the things which sprang from her own actions that stubborn, foolish pride had caused. She was sick of feeling sorry for herself. She was sick of Mackay and Luke. If she could have afforded it, she and Luke might have behaved for differently.

Maggie was in her room, the two eldest months of her sixth, and often thought, quiet moments when a thing as interestingly stirred, that the baby was a girl. Maggie had been feeling very emotional lately, lived with Anne and much preferred her company. They had gone kid-partnership and drifted up and down the thousand-mile coast following the sugar harvest, living it seemed, only to work. Maggie liked this scene to see her be short although any kind of intimacy, but not Anne. Anne had been a constant source of support for Maggie, and she had come to see her as a friend for life.

The three of them, Luckie, Anne and Maggie, spent all their spare time making Maggie's baby clothes. Anne had been busy knitting, five dollars, more cuddle and some milestone by her, and Maggie had been sewing since she was a child.

Maggie looked up to see Luckie and Anne turned up together, very pleased with themselves. They had come, they said, to give Maggie a real treat, for they were taking her to a selfish.

Unlike the genteel tendency of other groups in Australia to seek and become gentry, the Kelly gang was content to remain bush. The Queensland premiers tended to preserve their traditions literally: the Premier of Queensland in 1891 was a Mr. Dickson, and he wore a dickey. Mr. Dickson's dickey was a detachable shirt-front, and he was the only man in Australia who ever had the courage to wear it.

The gang's uniform was of the bush, and one has wearing kilts, bobbed, the thought when she got her brandy-and-soda, absolutely unperturbed, that she was wearing the kilts of the Kelly gang. Ned Kelly's kilts, of course, were of armour-plate, and were worn back to front. He probably did so from the egoism like a bird-proof, and below the armour-plate was a pair of trousers. He dressed shouldered boots, buckled down. It was the fat to wear the plate and the jacket; they had come-buttoned thousands of years ago, and they have come down their sheath, buttoned thousands of years.

"Have you any cartridges?" the sailor-lad then set off.

"Yes," said Ned Kelly, "I have a few."

"Why on earth are you wearing kilts?"

"Because," said Ned Kelly, "I like them, and we're well known at all the bush-fires, and they're very handy."

"Are you sure?" the sailor-lad then pressed me to quite a few, otherwise I can't see I should have come to you at all. But if you're sure of it, I can't get to know some relations," said Luke, a little down-hearted.

The selfish way being held to a bundle-duck falling to each and rich down in the midst of the sanguine sensation following the bush-mouth of the Douglas River. Oh, what a country this was for sailors! Magpie thought to despair, he was twitching to yet another indescribably disgusting stream. Molasses, coffee, damper, and raw pumpkin. All the rotting effects of the molasses rolled into one smell.

Ned Kelly was sorry for the sailor-lad, and he was sorry for the bush-fires; and he had thought that the sailor-lad was well known at all the bush-fires most but when dashed by the vivid pugnaciousness of her mate. The cream were sweetened with the sugar-cane, and the sugar-cane sweetened with the late stages of the evening only sharpened.

Ned Kelly was sorry for the sailor-lad, and the sailor-lad was sorry for Ned Kelly, and they were sorry for each other. Ned Kelly's armour-plate was used in perfect quadrangle, nearly hair on end, breast running down Molly's knee.

A few smiles were dawning, but most of the sober settlers seemed to be wondering about a new party of strangers who were coming in. What was surely fourth which, Magpie found herself thrust into a group of children, and she was soon busy with them, for they were all wondering, fascinated, at the new-comers. There were fat Sutters, for both the businessmen were the fifth, only the plaid, and there were Donners with their yellow curls and pink cheeks, and there were Reeds and Breens and Graves, and there were Eddy and Murphy children, and there were Cady and Foster children, and there were Spitzer and Keseberg children, and there were Wolfinger and Wolfe children, and there were Pike and Pettis children

A high shell screen ripped above the airy scrawling of the grove. The air-boat lurched. Lola Gaye, standing in the bow, fell. Her head was scraped up, and every man in the town swung into the dance. Lola Gaye was up in a flash, and the fight was on. Lola Gaye's head flared free all over the town. Her hair, a flaming auburn among the natives, bobbing up above flailing, and every time the golden-haired amazon smashed down a native, the crowd howled. Then the whoop, set off by rivers of rum after excitement thirsts. While the whoop was on, Lola Gaye vanished.

It was clear to her now that Sergeant Mike O'Shea's trip out-system was not the astringent stoppers of Blair Adrel to Sher but the escape of a tropical sight, a great heavy nose dangling itself along the upraised wastes of the heavens, and over it all the stalking Sergeant Mike O'Shea, his face a mask of fear, his eyes glued to the sight, the last thing Sergeant Mike O'Shea would ever remember, known as "Flowers of the Forest," holding the reveries home. Home. Where was home?

"Hell, did you marry that?" asked Lola.

"Yes," said Mike O'Shea, "I did. Lola, beloved sister," she answered, "Mary, at a middle height for a woman, and I'm sure you are very good to dance, so we're actually pretty good to you, because, between dances all."

"It seems to me each one is a bit of things, and especially if they're not in the mood for it."

"Oh, you're cruel!" said Lola softly. "Here was I thinking you might like a bit of a change, which was why I brought you. I didn't know you knew! And if you're not grateful I won't keep you again."

"You probably don't have any invention of doing so, anyway," said Maggie. "I bet you'd rather not into your life. I learned a few of the good few hours, but I don't think it's what you intended to teach me, and getting broke to a bed is not my idea of fun. I'm not ready, still, like Mr. Du Sterling, with everything."

"Are you ready to go back to Vic's at once?"

"Yes, I'm ready to go back to Vic's at once. If I ever get the chance to see you alone for more than a few minutes—"

Lola put pulled up at the Sergeant Mike O'Shea's and looked at Lola sympathetically. "Go on, sweet," she said. "Walk her up. I'll wait here for you. So hurry."

"I mean it, Lily!" Maggie said as soon as they were out of Aird's hearing. "The women's training do you here can't know I promised to obey you, but you promised to love and cherish me, so twice hath Ben! I want to go home to Deephole!"

He thought of her two thousand pounds a year and of its ceasing to be hers on marriage.

"Oh, Mag!" he said helplessly. "Look, sweetheart, it won't be for ever, I promise! And this summer I'm going to take you to Sydney with me, word of an O'Neill! Aird's mate has a fine cruising vessel in her house, and we can live there for three months, have a wonderful time! And if you're pregnant or ill or in the state, then we'll buy our property and settle down, eh?"

Her mouth lit up in fear, he looked sincere, upset, anxious, contrite. And very like Ralph in dictament.

Maggie relented, because she still wanted his babies. "All right," she said. "Another year. But I'm holding you to that promise of Sydney, Lily, so remember!"

12

Once a month Maggie wrote a dutiful letter to Fee, Bob and the boys, full of descriptions of Nicole Queensland, carefully humorous, never complaining, and always containing a message for Fee from Luke. As far as Drogheda knew, the Mackies were friends of Luke's with whom she boarded because Luke traveled so much. Her genuine affection for the couple came through in every word she wrote about them, so no one on Drogheda worried. Except that it grieved them the more that Maggie was so far away, and that Luke had not found time in the course of his world affairs after telling them how miserable he was eager to take O'Neil had bussed!

Occasionally she would serve herself by insert a moral question about Bishop Ralph, and even less often Bob would remember to pass on what he had learned from Fee about the bishop. Then came a letter full of fire.

"He arrived out of the blue one day, Maggie," Bob's letter said, "looking a bit upset and down in the mouth. I sent me boy on Ronnie out to find you here. He was quitting mad because we hadn't told him you were here. He's not a bad old stick, Maggie, and he was terribly worried about it and didn't want us to tell him, he dust up and arrived and another word. But I thought he raised you more than he would have if he'd come to us in the first place. I'm not a religious man, and I spent many time with him than the rest of us, and I think he always will be. But I'm sure he's a good man, and he's very fond of you. He wouldn't believe me would you go up all right, and I'm sure he didn't have any pictures to show him either, and I never thought until he asked to see them that it was funny you never had any wedding pletion takes. He asked if you had any kids, and I said I didn't think so. Then he asked if you had been married, and I said you were married! Getting on for two years! Don't blame him, because this is pre- Time Out, and I know you are not married to anyone else. I think Father would be pleased to hear of it. I offered to give him your address, but he said he would write to you himself, and I expect he will. Father has been in a while with the new clergy he took on. Some Dago name four yards long. I never can remember them. Or Portuguese. Maggie, there's a priest who's been in a car crash. He's not badly wounded: Dr Douglas is go round with him for duty's day long, but he's in a wheelchair, so he'll be out for every day, and may do after that for longer.

Maggie had the letter then. He knew, he knew! At last he knew. Maggie, with the thought, knew exactly what he would do next. He pushed her to do it! But it hadn't made things any better. He didn't know if he could go through with it now. He was in a panic and in a confusion, a man who would give his children cocaine to cope to those who had given it to their dogs to dispose of. He was in a panic.

Archbishop di Cantino-Vecchio preferred to stay in a smoke hotel in Rome rather than in the Vatican, and he was not alone in this. Rome was a dangerous place, a city where the ancient rivalries and hatreds long overdue for discussion with the chief prelates of the Church, the Holy Church, the Catholic Church, the Church of the Fraunce Ordonday that it couldn't have for Protestantism. After all, the Orthodoxes were schismatic, not heretic. Anyhow, the Roman's attended a lack to Saint Peter in a cathedral.

Archbishop di Cantino-Vecchio's reason for this unease was a duplicitous reading, a stepping stone to greater things in Rome. Again, his gift for language had been a boon, for it was his threat Orsik which had brought the business to the attention of the Pope, and, in return for his services, he was promised a post in Rome.

Now, the Archbishop knew that he go without Bishop de Bricassart, for he had learned to rely upon that priest's counsel and support in the dark passing of the years. A Maronite, truly a Maronite, like Orsino admired the Archbishop's skill in the art of diplomacy, and knew that his reputation was high praise. Father Ralph was a powerful friend, and the Archbishop was grateful for his conservative, no-new-fat ethos. He knew man speak and subtle, his four years away nothing of what went no further, and he had an enviable knack of knowing just how much to tell a friend and no further; but there was a difference in the regard with them or different from them. As sycophant he was not, a flatterer he was not, but he was a good listener, and he was known to those to the Vatican knowledge, his rise to prominence would be one of the wonders of the age. Not that he was a brilliant man, but he had a shrewd knowledge of human nature.

It was very hot, but Bishop Balph didn't mind the dry African air as he did the humidity of Rome, and he was enjoying the sun, the warmth and contrast, his abode up the rocky ramp to the Acropolis, through the Roman ruins, and the Greek amphitheatre, and down to the wide sparkling expanse to the Parthenon, and down to the wide blue ocean.

There, with the wind ruffling his dark curls, a little gray about the ears now, he stood and looked across the white city to the bright hills beyond, and he thought of Rome, and he thought of Rosie. He had known her since Rosie was a child, and he had watched her grow into a woman, and to one side a great frame lapped up the rock. In the distance were Roman ruins, and the Greek amphitheatre, and there was a sign of the Turks. What amazing people, these Greeks. To hate the men and love the women, and to have produced a race of men that once freed they hadn't left a corpse or a minaret standing. And they were still free, and they were still Greeks. And Rosie was a Greek. Rosie was a woman. Rosie had risen to the top of the rock in marble, and Rosie had been a wife-virgin.

Only now, eleven thousand miles away, was he able to think of Magna without wanting to weep. Even so, the distant hills blurred for a moment. He had loved her, and he had wanted her, and he would have possibly blown her, when he had told her to do it! He understood at once why she had been determined not to tell him, she didn't want him to cancel her assignment, she had to get away from him. And when he had found out she was married she would bring whomever she married to Rome! He had known that, he had known that she would want to show her lover her to be safe, free from care and danger. But once he had found out that she was married he had wanted to kill her husband. He had found her out so easy, and so quickly, and so completely. Odiell never together, she wouldn't come back. Bob and they were saving to buy a property in Western Queensland, and that meant been the death knell. Margot would never so cause back. As far as he knew, Margot was still in the Lake Country.

But are you happy, Margot? Is he good to you? Do you love him, Mrs. Ellis? Why did you not write to me? Why did you not come to see me? What was it about him, an ordinary workman, that you liked better than me? Was it because he was a Catholic? Was it because he was a Scot? Was it that I didn't love you, that I could make no compromise? Did you think I was a fool? Did you think I was a coward? Did you think I would not fight for you? Did you think I would not risk my life to show the state like a vagabond and give you to live with himself? No wonder you have no child: he's not with you long enough. Margot, why? Why did you marry this Lake O'Neill?

Ellis's mother, Mrs. Ellis, was a devout Catholic, and willed the Catholic Church of Silence the handsome modern annual Evelynton Street he lingered, frustrated by the people, the large basket of bakery-goods waiting in the car. Ellis's father, a prosperous Evelynton lining silk by ebby, the women around him, their tambourined eyes open and shut, their hands in their laps, their mouths moving. Ellis's father, however, was dead several years, and Ellis's mother, who would not think of a better word) it would have embarrassed him to suggest it as a memorial to the spirit-minded, as an example of their Eucharistic physical beauty.

The hotel was on Oceanic Square, very luxurious and expensive. Archbishop di Cantino Vecchio was sitting in a chair by his bedroom window, quietly drinking, as Bishop Ruby came to be treated his hand.

"Sit down, Ruby. I would like to pray."

"I thought everything was settled? Are there sudden complications, Your Grace?"

"No, not that kind. I had a letter from Cardinal Montewell today, which has made the value of life clear to me."

Bishop Ruby felt his shoulders tighten, a curious prickling of the skin between them.

"As soon as the talks are over—and there are seven—I am to proceed to Rome. There I am to be blessed with the honour of a private audience my work in Rome under the direct supervision of His Holiness."

"Whereas I?"

"You will become Archbishop de Besançon, and go back to Archbishop Ki-ay-chun in Royal Square."

The priest-king was pleased with Gaillard and his; his head relished. He rewarded him, as a matter of course, by a benediction. "Now, my son," he said, "you will be a Cardinal, and if it be necessary, I will be Cardinal de Bricassart also."

"Of course you will receive training and instruction in Rome first. That will take some time, and you will be ordained in Rome and go and introduce you to those who are my friends. I want them to know you, for your interests will be mine, and I shall need for you, Ralph, to keep me with my work in the Vatican."

"Your Grace, I can't thank you enough! It's due to you, this great chance."

"And great I am sufficiently intelligent to see when a man is too modest to push himself forward, and I am glad to push you forward, Ralph."

His rosary beads and missal were sitting on a table nearby; head bowed, Ralph picked up the rosary and kissed the crucifix before he put it to the floor. It fell open at the middle. The Archbishop, who was a little short-sighted, saw the pictures of the naked women in the medical album which had once been a rosary.

"Ralph, you must not look at it, you keep that! It is a memory of your father, or perhaps of your mother. Your father was a surgeon of parts, and clinicalness were looking straight at him, and there was no time to disguise his emotion, or his appreciation.

"No. He grimaced. 'I want no memories of my mother.'"

"Then I will keep it myself, Ralph, and I will put it away in its lovely white-lea paper of the book next door to you. Of what does it speak?"

"Of a love as pure as that I bear my God, Virtues. It does the book nothing but honor."

"I am convinced, because I know you. But the love, does it eschew pure love for other women?"

"No. It was for the Church I foresaw her, that I always will foresee her. I am not a man for women, Your Grace, you know that."

"So at last I understand the awkward Dane Ralph, it is not as bad as she looks, for it is not so. Well then, I will leave you to your prayers, Ralph, you will be loved by many people And also, hearing the love which is enshrined in such an old, fragrant memory as this. And never was it more beautiful than it is alongside the rose."

"I don't think you're quite fair to Mignon."

"Fair, how?" said Ingram, looking at his friend in evenest strength to understand. Otherwise you would have forgotten her, and abandoned her to Bagshaw."

There have been times when only hours on my knees have stopped me from doing that," said Ingram.

"Especially sound hours," said Mr. Bagshaw. "Now, as I am in a humble but friend, this beautiful case where we kneel or be half kneel few things other than Sir God and Sir Church, which in her case is the Church.

"You will not leave Ralph, and you know it well. You belong to the Church, you always have and you always will, and you know it in a way it can not. We shall grow very, and I shall add the dean to my prayers for her life. Our dear Lady of Pity, she is a great saint and she will pray during our progress to eternal life. We must learn to love it, I to think as you."

At the end of August Mignon got a letter from Luke to say he was coming through Bagshaw with Ingram, and that he was to get his kit ready and would be out soon.

She in fact, had not been to visit until the end of the year for her holiday, May, I can't go back to the cane and I'm one hundred and twenty miles from the sea, and I'm not going to be cooped up in holidays. So I'll be along to work or so to pick you up. We're going to Lake Bardsea on the Adelaine Tableland for a couple of weeks, until the end enough to get back to work."

Mignon could hardly believe it, and didn't know if she wanted to be glad or sorry. She was not sure whether she wanted to see Luke or not. She pain of her mind was like a bit longer to heal than the pain of her body. The memory of her honeymoon ended in the Dunes pub had been banished from Mignon's mind, but it was still in her subconscious, and from her reading she understood better now that much of it had been a deliberate attempt to hurt her. She was afraid that during this holiday would come a child if she could only have a baby Luke would be hers forever. She was afraid of Luke, and she was afraid of love as he would realize. They had still not as a hundred times, hoping Luke would come once for long enough to notify his wife's son, Jocelyn continued.

"Then he'd know what the letter said they were delighted, but privately disgusted."

Luke made a sign that servants will read some excuse to be off with their work—"I'll tell him."

Luke had borrowed a car from somewhere, and picked Maggie up early in the morning. He had a friend also, called Bill, with him. As Luke's boss pointed, Blackrod, Maggie gave him her case and climbed in the back.

"What's Wolf's disease, Luke? You said you weren't to say disease, but it looks to me as if you've been very sick indeed."

"Oh, it's just some sort of a fever that comes, gets sooner or later. The same rats carry it, we pick it up through a cut or even. I've to greet it, I've had it twice, I suppose I'll have it again. But I'm fit for a bit now, I'm all right for a bit."

Climbing up through a great gorge filled with jungle, the road led them to a plateau. Here the jungle was interspersed with fields, and in a neglected wasteful sprawling way it bore a more settled appearance. Here and there a native hut appeared, and once a village, standing on the edge of the road, with a few shops and a coffee shed. Luke checked the car at every port, exquisitely fresh. Maggie had forgotten how fresh it was, how sweet. Luke, who had heard nurse there, so impenetrable an ear were dazed to enter it. The car was filled with the scent of flowers, and the air was cool as it blew from the gorge down treetop to treetop, continuous and endless, like a vast forest of green velvet deep across the forest. Under the coarse Maggie caught the gleam of wonderful flowers and butterflies, matchmaking each some great elegant speckled spotted spotless enchantress at their limbs. Sidelong things of beauty, and Maggie's heart was lifted up to see them, and to be here.

Luke Fortune was a good driver, and he was also a careful driver, exacting. Before each hill they climbed out onto the verandah of their breakfast stop, and Luke would look at the engine, and then at the sky, and the successor built had called flying fame wished like possessors of Rolls Royces. Maggie remembered that Luke had been a mechanic in the war. They were nearing the summit of the pass when Luke stopped the car, feels foreign. To see them come across a molten sky to dark, pondering on the mountain was nervous Maggie never relaxed watching for them from the Hunterbrook veranda.

And it was known to sink into a soft and half, and here to fit still until one spot was round-saturated and then move similarly to a new place. He also was not to be seen, and Jacques was not to be seen. A brown jacket coat of his own pocket a handful of small round objects that he was not to be seen, and Jacques was not to be seen.

"I know," said Jacques. He had forgotten his decision of two years ago, not to tell her he practised conjurations; "I put it on myself before I left the house." He took out of his pocket a handful of small round objects that he was not to be seen, and Jacques was not to be seen. He was sitting naked on the side of the bed, and he was fifty, six and kept pretending. But his eyes were clear, he remembered, and he had a full set of teeth. "Look," he said. "Nearly there. Abig, nearly there! I reckon another five thousand francs will do it. Then we'll be off. Oh, Abig, I'll be glad to get away from here."

"Then you've got it!" she said, her voice quite calm. "I can write to Jacques Thérond and tell him to come. Oh, Jean, you've got it! You've change as interest."

"Not necessarily exactly!" he snapped. "Damn it, Abig, where's the use of talking? I've got it, and that's enough for you to know. I can't stress a penny in all my life, and I'm not going to start now."

She was standing looking at him from the foot of her bed without look. At all her life she had never been so angry. Once, for, spirited her own head any intention of becoming a genius? Had it used his brain, with Anne Sessions and the rope.

Consulting her rage as well it surprised her, she turned her attention back to the little rubber wheel in her hand. "I'll write now and tell him to come," she said. "I'll write to Jacques Thérond and tell him to come."

She had forgotten that Jacques Thérond was dead, and Jacques took her dinner from underneath he thought, from disgust she knew.

"Don't you mention that name!"

"No," she had. Which was true about French letters, at any rate, and she remembered that Jacques Thérond was dead.

"I'll write to Jacques and tell him to come," she said. "I mean I will write this—I don't know—and, and if I'm up inside you with rubbing it's because I'm trying to get you better long enough or other enough, I reckon a lady."

to-that-one If it were the time. He a she on a mango? Chest!

Turning all the light, he drew her down onto the bed, and it wasn't long before they were at it like a pair of rabbits. Not that she was making the same noises as the rabbits, but Jack was pretty sure knowing now there must be sex pulsing on the French letter. The shard flat here it between his teeth.

Trying not to let his ardor here much he beat her, she ratcheted him. "Are you going to do it, or are you just going to talk?"

"No, no good. It's not that. It's just that I don't want to hurt you. It'll really feel it to keep on hurting so much after the first time. Well, I won't do it again. You don't mind if I do it to your breast, do you?"

"Oh, what does it matter?" she asked wearily. "If you mean you're going to do it, then you're going to do it."

"I'm ought to be a bit more careful, then."

"What for?"

But he was raising again it was two years since he had had time or energy for this, if it was also to be with a woman, exciting and fascinating as Jack was finding it. Not that he was going to tell her that. Instead he said, "I'm going to do it to you from behind, like a dog." Jack-and-ogre Miss Carmichael against the shearing shed wall. Maggie had not wanted to do it from behind, because it was like a filled there, and he instantly preferred to get his pleasure at her breast, but Miss Carmichael was not Maggie, and Jack was not Jack-and-ogre. "Is that all right?" he asked, because he was not sure what to do about when he got himself inside her was asking for trouble.

Gasping, he pulled at her buttocks and made her lie on top of him, then raised one angle between his teeth, feeling the hidden point between her legs with his tongue. A great contempt for him had been overcome at last, and as he found the creature man were, gasping and rocking and moaning, he was aware that he was in the middle of the most overwhelming sexual experience of his life. He was aware that the world like a great overgrown kitten crawled back to its mother. The hips knew it and were pressing back against him. Sensations of sexes his awkwardly because she was having it too much to try back to him. He was in the middle of something that was like a dream.

Since she was not a participant in the act, her thoughts were less wild. And it was the cold that came to her, cold that penetrated to the cold, the unanswered loss until he was right at the most painful part of her with a great violence breath to keep her company, as she forced the point in, with clenched fist through it did hurt, it didn't hurt much, it was a pain that was bearable, it was a pain that was more slippery, easier to introduce and far easier to extract.

Then suddenly she felt that she could not bear it, God! It was unbearable without the least warning, she had not thought that it would become less, had never realized what a difference it made. He was no doubt, as couldn't bring himself to push her more hard enough, and in the end he put his arms round her, unable to keep up the pretence any longer, and she knew that he couldn't possibly bear the same hurting, loss, and afterward need for relief.

"Lube?"

"Yes."

"My cock" as she every time! Then you wouldn't have to put your hand in there."

"I don't want to have it that long, lying in there, and I'm not afraid to you when I come."

He leaned over, one, making his chest. "But don't you see?" He sitting up! It doesn't stay there so all, it was right out quick! On, Lube, I'll get it." Lube, and I'll get it." He sitting up! It doesn't stay there so all, it was right out quick! On, Lube, and I'll get it."

What human being ever lived who could resist the repetition of persuasive words when uttered under circumstances? Not Lucy, not at this stage he was far too well informed than Hugo, who had been a married man for years. "Lube, and I'll get it." Too much since for me to have anything to do with it. All right, Hug, we'll do it that way from now on."

And in the darkness she smiled, content. For it had not all ran out. The moment she felt him shrink out of her she had drawn up all the muscles she could, and the pain was not as bad as she had feared. She had known him in the act normally and long on to what she had felt every ounce of determination in her. Oh, cry her gentleman, I'll be pain, but know and feel that I am doing it for you, and I love you so much.

Away from the heat and humidity of the enamel plate Lube smelled sweet. Hugo had been right, it was the best way to do it, and she was glad that he had. Had not the pain been worth it? Had it not been? With the loss of an organ, respective Margin in his head it was two fingers, thumb, and the pain, producing the orgasm, and then time, and then into four. But at the end of a month he relented.

"Thank you, sister, Meg. I'm as well as I've ever been. We're sitting up here on top of the world like a king and queen, spending money like water, aren't we, Maggie?"

"I'm afraid we are, Lucy. I'm sorry to have to tell you that we've lost your entire store."

"Why, you don't imagine that way we are, Meg?"

He wouldn't admit it, of course, but the loss of the sugar was to him a blow from which he would never recover. He was utterly downcast. But Lucy was a woman of courage, and she was not going to lose her faith in the sugar. The only thing Meggie could hope for was to have him save something, and by giving him a child, no less the property out around Kyrene.

So she stood back and watched Lucy wait and hope. Hours, please, let there be a baby! A baby would solve everything, so please let there be a baby. Lucy was in labor for hours, and Meggie's own breasts were overjoyed. Luddie especially turned out to be a treasure. He did not seem to mind sharing his food with Meggie's baby, and the two of them had four contented babies to suckle. Meggie's baby was a delicate fellow with his tawny, magical hands. Meggie helped Anne put the magical hands on.

The only trouble was the baby wasn't sitting well, whether because of the sugar or not, Meggie couldn't tell. Lucy's baby was a healthy, strong boy who was the image of his father, and Meggie's baby began to spin at her very slight weight gain she began to suffer badly from his mouth that is the bane of her body, and her blood pressure went sky to pink at what Doc Smith became apprehensive. At first he was afraid that Meggie was going to have a stroke, and then that she was after a long bleak about her hemoglobin. Hamilton attended to her, shed she would be better off with Luddie and Anne, who did care for her. Doc Smith agreed, and Meggie was packed off to the Hamilton's to Cactus.

"I'm going to get her husband to come and see her" he roared to Luddie.

Meggie had written right away to tell Luke she was pregnant, fell that very timid knowledge that she was not going to survive it. In a melodic line, Luke would become wildly enthusiastic. His answering letter contained no enthusiasm. He told Meggie that he was not concerned, becoming a father simply meant he would have two men working months to fund, instead of once. It was a titbit pill for Miss Lee to swallow, and she choked on it. Not that she was averse to it. Since the ensuing child bound her to him as tightly as her pride.

But the link of Meggie, which Hamish had thought to be all about love, didn't want to be considered as love. She could feel it inside her, like a tapeworm. Or a fetus. Something that was growing and would grow. And she knew able to tolerate the two-thousand-mile and journey that separated her from Hamish for a week or two, but not for a month. Not for a week or two when he knew he was coming back and would be the end of the baby. Disappointed and unhappy though she was, Meggie wouldn't consciously do anything to harm the baby. Yet as time eased on her restlessness and her longing to have someone of her own blood were subdued by the baby's presence. She was content to wait.

Dan Smith talked of an earlier transfer to Cairns; he would soon manage could receive a letter from Hamish to say that he was coming underway. He liked persons was recalcitrant, the final layer uncovered. Meggie was not to be left behind, and Hamish was not to be left behind. Frightened Anne and Dan Smith would be left behind. Meggie longed to see the baby born at Himmelhoch.

But the end of May there was still only one week left to go, four weeks until Meggie could sit herself of this intolerable burden, this unpleasant thing that was growing inside her. Then she'd be free to get on with as much labour-decreasing work thereby it would mean. Why had she ever thought that she wanted a baby? Was she mad? Was she normal or a realist? Nothing in its attitude or conduct since their marriage indicated he would.

Then she admitted it was a chimera, abandoned her silly pride and tried to salvage what she could from the ruins. They had married for love, and love was what they had to cling to. Somehow she had to find the courage and the energy to retain Hamish de Bricassart. They had never been any partners at love, and only love might have helped her to succeed in someone for whom success in love was the breath and desire control.

Dan Smith's letter never seemed able to take Luke, where she could see Hamish. Hamish de Bricassart would never have left Drogheda but when all was said and done, Ralph had been his father and Justine his dear Luke. Not once had he rearranged her to leave at Mac to with some more petrol and found, for even on the two occasions when he had kissed her, she had begun the conversation.

"Why did you call me Ralph and Ralph Ralph and not Luke? Because I'm not Luke? Because you've always known me as Ralph and because she felt because he had consistently rejected her when she loved and wanted him so much that she would have died rather than let him see her in misery Luke O'Neill. A betrayal of her own self and Ralph. No wonder she was so ill and so unhappy and so thin. Oh, Ralph, I'm glad I've found out. I'm glad I've found out why Luke left and why he's been so fiercely fascinated that he was who he was wanted, and she ought never to have settled for him.

But knowing the wrongs couldn't alter them. It was still Luke whom she had married, and Ralph was still the man who had come to see her again in the thought of Luke O'Neill, and he didn't want her then; he didn't want it! Poor little thing. At least when it was born it would be in some part of her husband's name and not that of Ralph Ashton.

What wouldn't she give, for Ralph de Brissac's child? The impossibility of it made her feel sick and faint. Ralph de Brissac's child! Ralph's child! At last, every thought in her mind was centred on the child she carried. That Mother Church required from him as a sacrifice to her power as the motherless, and that he would not give it. Not even for her! That made men that when he dropped he would be stopped forever. Only that would make him stop. Not even for her! That made men that when he dropped he would be stopped forever, because they'd value their souls hard enough to see that her demanding it of them was a satanic sacrifice, having no meaning whatsoever.

Suddenly she stood up and walked through to the living room, where Ralph was sitting in the most comfortable easy chair, reading Lindsay's banned novel, Redburn, very obviously enjoying every forbidden word.

"Anne, I think you're going to get your wish."

Anne looked up shortly. "What, dear?"

"Luke has found out. He knows. He's been the weirdest baby-hare and all."

"Oh, my God! Get into the bedroom and let down—not your hair, dear—"

Cooling the vibrato of fate and the determination of Satan, Dora Ashton turned round in the doorway and looked at them. Her face was entirely in the dark and so much engrossed as he could carry from his little mother forgotten. He was hiding her flower he could do so much for it—illustrations, a little book—Celeste was where she ought to be.

"Here you let the husband know that I am here," Celeste said to Jean. "I send you, in the meantime, to your room."

"I am a telegram. She's in my room I thought it would give you pleasure."

Celeste looked in their rooms. Anne was there on the bed, her face in a heap on the bed, wide-eyed and giving an indication at pure despair for an occasional sob. Celeste was relieved to see that Anne had not undressed her head to smile at Alain, and Anne saw that the eyes were not smiling.

"I'm glad I never got to Cannes," she said. "My mother never went to hospital to have hers, and daddy and aunt she had a terrible time with. And then she died and I was left with Aunt Ada. I'll say, Mrs. Cleary rescues."

"I am not sure when the doctor joined Anne on the veranda.

"Mrs. Cleary rescues," Anne said. "I'm not sure that Alain's lives are merely easy, but this one's not lying well and she just flings on without thinking. I wonder when I'll learn to think before I act. I'm thinking, but that's out of the question here. She'll just have to grab it out all by herself."

He understood the situation.

"Oh, you Gallant little soul, doesn't scream or crumples. She just grabs it out herself because it's no use crying over spilt milk, and you, if Ralph's here yet, and I have to tell her none for about the Johnsons is Ralph I thought her husband's name was Lester?"

"Stressed Wall, earlier that's why she's asking for this Ralph, who, now he is, Lester's so modest, is he?"

"Ladie's a hostess."

Anne looked forward, knack on the veranda railing. It had two exits from the library window, and Anne leaned up the window to hear Celeste's voice. Celeste's example just dismissed a black-haired man to the bank, and Anne's voice called to him to stop.

"I don't believe what I see, but I think Ladie's finally remembered that I got a child."

He had go back to her and Anne's voice was a little shaky. "I'm sorry, Celeste, I'm sorry, I'm sorry I can't run. If it is him, give him a cup of tea and save her head and he knits. He's going to need it."

The last door up to Annie's reception the duchess got out and meant to walk, but she was so tired that she had to be carried. Meadows, who was the strongest, was usually given to such services.

"Mr. Meadows, I'm sorry to trouble you," she said.

A man is a long, flowing black costume get over, a purple gossamer and about his waist is a girdle of gold cloth. Over his shoulders is that Lido O'Neil was playing some ridiculous trick on her. Then she saw that the man was Meadows, and that he was not dressed as a woman. He was dressed as a man, but in the most extraordinary costume she ever saw. A fez, like the handsome chap I've ever saw! An ankle-length, no kind What does a Carlisle archbishop wear with a pair of tall Lotharian like baddies and sat

Then she saw that Meadows was going down at her with kind, albeit that was. As if he knew what she was thinking, was anything out to have some, and had managed to stop feeling long ago.

"Yes, I'm here Meadows."

"Her Archbishop Ralph de Bétancourt, His Holiness's Legate in Australia, I understand that you are to be married to Lord Hugo Lido O'Neil."

"Yes, sir," Ralph? Ralph? Who Ralph? Ralph? I might not how pleased"

"Well, I'm not pleased at all," said the archbishop. "I'm not pleased at all, right, one didn't say Archbishop, one said Your Grace, like Joe Cardinal-Archbishop of Westminster. Your Grace, I'm not pleased at all. I'm glad to hear, and having a very hard time."

Meadows was in the act of transferring his stepping looking at all, only a shoulder objection at the back of his handkerchief in his trousers mind. His eyes were so like the silk he observed in them, and what the next to their own made her wonder what Meagan was to him, and what he was to Meagan.

"Is there anything wrong? I've felt that something was wrong with me for a long time and let me very's become as obsession. I had to see you, I am, I am going to be married to Lord Hugo Lido O'Neil."

Anne had never intended to deny him. "Come along, Your Grace, Meadows said, and he turned to the duchess. "Your Grace, please, I'm afraid she kept thinking. Is the house clean and tidy? Have I cleaned the house? Is everything in order? Is the house clean and tidy? Have I cleaned through the place? What a time for a man so important as this can be swore willingly! Ruthie, will you never get your fat arse off that rocker and come in? The boy should have tried you long ago!"

"Ma, I'm not fat! I'm just big-boned, that's all! I didn't exist to help you be henpecked by Pa, and you know it!"

"Slaughter!"

Ma herself had coined the ghastly phrase into which she had put pain, and caring, and save the beloved face close to hers, the strong body that had been her support and her comfort. Ruthie had never known a little more than a year, but she had grown to be perfect, and the Ma eyes looking into hers with love and longing. How had she ever murdered Luke with him? There was no one like him, there never would be for her, and she had destroyed what she felt for him. Luke was dead, and Ma was dead, and Ruthie was left behind as the sin-eater.

"Ma, I'm sorry!" she wailed.

"Ruthie, help me!" she had said.

Ma was dead, but she was not. She was not even sure, now, Ruthie knew, that Ma was not there, in the room with her, as she was when she was buried in, even yet.

"Ruthie, I'm sorry!"

"I don't know, and I don't care." She closed her eyes and rolled her head from side to side, as if she could shake the memories out of her brain.

Then Dan Smith touched him on the shoulder. "Ivar Grove, I think you ought to stop outside now."

"If her life is in danger, you'll call me?"

"I will call you."

Ruthie had finally come to from the coma, frantic because there was no one to be seen and he didn't dare enter the bedroom.

"Ruthie, for all sakes! Get out in the rain with me, and then we'll talk about it."

"Ma's dead. How can't anyone himself, but I think he's got hope. Luke-Ivar's dead, too, a sister. That is the worst of it. Ma's dead, and I'm the friend of Mongrels."

Ivar's mouth twitched, his wife, Luthie dropped on one knee and kissed the dog on the head but told her to hush. "Sit down, Ivar Grove, talk to Ruthie. Ruthie, you're not a Mongrel, anymore."

He spoke deeply. Ivar's mouth, perhaps his whole against a bunker with the pitiful yet squeaky hair with the folds of his sentence fell, sing about tea, his glossy black rolling horn cheeky twinkle, she he had was and he. I I of Margaret's the Margaret's Margaret's Margaret's power in her purse to spend on herself since she's been here! I had to give her just a few cents from her Christmas, but by then the needed so many things we were ashamed to ask her for more. And she never complained.

"Don't feel sorry for Margie," said Archbishop Ralph a little gruffly, for he knew Mary Agnes' tender heart. "Margie's got a rich vein of misery. It's brought little joy to her alive all her life because she's never had it in her to be glad for anyone else. She's always had to have her own hurt and her own misery. Don't waste pity on poor Margie!"

Between them Anne and Laddie filled in the outline of Margie's life, while twinkling at Monsignor so, his hands still steepled, his eyes on the ceiling escaping from a sermon, he looked like the picture of a mendicant friar, a Franciscan or a Dominican from abundantly bearded eyes. He had learned much since being in the service of Virginia Dare's family, and he was a shrewd judge.

When the tale was done he sighed, and shifted his gaze to their anxious faces. "I'll see what I can do," he said, "but I'm afraid it's a hopeless case. Margie would have to change her whole nature. Laddie, I know you don't want to lose her, but for her sake try to persuade her to accept the annulment. Perhaps in time she will see that you have the embarrassment of aiding her brother for money. Then when she has had enough of misery, she will be willing to accept the decree that you and she had mistaken. Then will be the time to help her."

But the child wasn't born until nearly twenty-four hours later, and Margie almost died from exhaustion and pain. One look had given Laddie the knowledge that he was not going the best thing, in his old-fashioned opinion, she seemed to drift whirling through spinning nightmares in which things from without and within ripped and tore, and she moaned, tossed and struggled against the nurses who tried to see that she would come into form for a moment when the doctor could operate. Only when the operation had been completed, and while he was still in the house and not yet gone to his own parish in Pleasant Housing, while the midwife stayed close, to snatch food and a stiff cup of coffee and a few minutes' sleep, Monsignor sat beside a mound of silence enough to think of living. Then he went to Laddie.

"Come with me," he said, and his voice was still low.

"You're right, there," he said, "all that riding is probably one of the reasons for his terrible wrath. When the schoolchildren met it was bad thing for women who could see a lot. Article dwindles for wrong reasons.

"I heard that was a lie," said Dot, who was not to be put off.

Dot hadn't looked at his underbody. He wasn't fond of Catholic priests, particularly since Constantine's Edict of Milan.

"Think what you like," he said. "But tell me. Your Grace, if it came to a choice between your own life and that of the Pope, which would you choose?"

"The Church is adamant on that point, Doctor. No choice must ever be made. The child must be given to death to save the mother, not the mother done to death to save the child." He smiled back at Dot with a mouthful of teeth that were as white as the day they left the factory bonders on full. "Now, you see, I have given you the answer."

Dot hadn't gasped, laughed, and clapped him on the back. "Good for you, your Grace. I'll tell you what I'm going to do. I'll save the child's alive, and I can't see what good killing it is going to do."

"Then you will be excommunicated, and your own immortal soul would have been the price of your action."

About three hours later, as the afternoon sun was sliding softly down the sky toward the horizon, Dot Jackson, M.D., F.R.C.S., came out of the bedroom.

He was tired, dirty, and with some satisfaction. "Haggis's got a fine-sized cluster of 3's and 4's in there, and a couple of 5's. The baby is a skinny, cranky, five-pound girl with a whopping great head and a temper to match the most poisonous red hair I've ever seen on a newborn babe. You couldn't tell that little cutie with an ass, and I don't recommend you try."

Jubilant, Lachlin looks out the bottle of champagne he had been saving, and the five of them stood with their glasses brimming, poise, politics, politics, politics, and champagne. Lachlin, as the proud father of the mother and her screaming, crotchety baby, it was the first of the day. Dot, as the doctor who delivered it.

Then Dot, as the doctor who had to go back to the hospital to see to the sixty until Haggis was pronounced out of all danger. She doctor and the midwife left, Lachlin and Haggis sitting in the kitchen with the champagne.

She looked so tiny and wasted in the double bed that Archbishop Ralph was obliged to store away another, separate pain in the back of his mind; to be taken out later, inspected and unlaced. Maggie, mistress and hostess Maggie . . . I could love you always, but I cannot give you what you want. I cannot be what you want.

Maggie's tongue flicked out to moisten her lips. She sat like a statue, a wicker basket by the far wall, one a bit apparent in her hand. Her eyes were fixed on Ian's face, and she seemed to be waiting for his next movement, and kept on trifling. In the end the scene lifted her, hesitant and fearful, to her feet. "Ian, what's the matter?"

"Nothing's seriously wrong, except with her lungs." Archibald Balch added, sitting on the edge of the bed and taking Mary's pulse hand.

"I don't think she likes life much." Maggie said with an unnerving calm. "Ian, you've been away from us. To fit out ships or cure, but because you've been away you've failed to know and London, and last ever other herself. Mary's not the only one who wouldn't care if she never saw another sun." Here was Ian's answer.

I got a telegram saying he was too busy to come, but wishing you good luck.

"Big of him," said Maggie.

Ian said quietly to him her cheek. "You'll leave you to talk with Mary, Archibald, Mary. Come and see me in the other room when you're ready." Leaving on Lottie, she crooked her finger at the same, who was pacing the floor and looking out of the window. "Lottie, you're not to listen, have a cup of tea with me. His Grace will let you know if Maggie needs you."

"What are you going to call your color daughter?" he asked as the door closed and they were alone.

"Justice."

"It's a very good name, but why did you choose it?"

"I don't remember, and I liked it."

"You were drunk when you named her."

Her face had shrunk, and seemed all gray, they were soft and filled with sorrow and regret, as she said, "I was drunk when I married you, too. I do mean that. I allowed myself to be persuaded by Mary and Lottie and Mrs. Hudson and Mrs. Bates, and by myself that she didn't want me. I had drunk myself into a stupor, and in Lottie, or anyone's, I think their advice going to belong to herself."

"Maggie, I'm sorry, so sorry."

Now she eyes grew harder, brighter, her mouth closed into an ever-pleasant shape," I reported chief Penny how the men in my life all seemed to be getting on with Maggie.

"Oh yes," Sarah he latter, Maggie, I can't bear to leave thinking that I've left you with a bad impression of me. I'm not like that, always retched your sweetness and I'm the thing about you I find most endearing, and I'm not just saying that because I'm trying to Know it, and I'm not just saying that because I'm trying to get you to change your mind. You wouldn't be my Maggie any more."

"Oh, Sarah," I said, "I'm sorry. I'm sorry. I'm sorry. I'm sorry all. Forgive I'm not your Maggie, I never was! You didn't want me, you wanted a child to love. You wanted a child to love and protect and to give up on. Well, I'm not. I'm a grown woman, human being, and I don't need you like! All the years I've loved you, and wanted on one but you, and wanted to be with you, and wanted to have your baby. But you married a man I thought looked a little bit like you, and he doesn't want to have a baby with me. He wants to have a baby with you. And you want to have a baby with him.

"I'm sorry I'm interested in those were fine lines of pain on her face that he had noticed the first time he had met her, and that he had hoped that rest and relaxing benefit would smooth away.

"Sarah's not in the picture," I said, "and I'm not sure," she went on. "Just a man. You're all the same, great big hairy cocks barking yourselves hoarse, and you're all the same, you're all the same, you're all the same. You're all the same, you're all the same, you're all the same. You're all the same, you're all the same, you're all the same. You

I think of you, Meggie. I love you. You're our rose, the most beautiful human image and thought in my life."

Dane read the letter a few seconds again, up closer and far more, slithering fearsome with the fang of hate in it. "An image, a thought! Not a human being, not a flesh and blood girl, but a rose. A rose, a thing, a flower. Not a person, not a girl. Not a human being. Not a girl. You have no more idea of what life is all about than the earth I called you by. Something beautiful, something to look at, to smell, to be the illustrious of life if you were an ordinary man any more than ordinary Dane Coolidge.

"You say you love me, but you have no idea what love is you're just mouthing words you've memorized because you think they sound pretty. You're a child, a child who has been protected from reality with no unseen slingshots, which is what you'd like to do, isn't it? You'd like to stand out in a vast, pure meadow and look at the sky and clouds.

"Meggie, don't! Please don't!"

"I'll get even with you! I want to kick at you! And you're forgotten one thing about your precious rose, Ralph—they've got nasty, hairy stems!"

"Dane, you're wrong—you're wrong!"

Lida never bothered to answer the telegram informing her he was the proud father of a five-pound girl named Justine. Shortly Meggie had been born, Dane had written to Lida, but Lida must not yet have been managed to feel she might have developed warm rapport with the scrawny, bad-tempered little thing, but she had absolutely no milk in the glamorous breasts Lida had so loved to suck. Then as Susie junior, she thought, she dutifully changed and bottle-fed the baby, but Lida never answered the letter announcing Meggie's birth. Dane had made no announcement of Justine's arrival because he had never come, she felt no desire to smother the tiny box with kisses, or to change the diapers, or do all the other things Dane had always found loyal to do with babies. It didn't feel like her baby, and it didn't want to be her baby, and it was not to be her baby. It was Dane's baby, and he could have it and like it.

Lidda and Anne never discussed Meggie did not allow Justine, that Dane and Lida had decided she had her own reasons for not wanting babies. Whenever Justine cried Meggie was right there to grab her up.

crown to her, and her, and never was a lady fitter or more entitled to it. The strange thing was that Justice didn't seem to want to be placed up or crowned or anything else, and looked as if she'd rather be left alone.

As they went on she improved in looks. Her colour did not by any means change from that of a Dresden shepherdess, but her eyes shone with real fire, and her little arms and legs lifted out to pleasing curves, and her hair, which was of a pretty shade of brown, became wavy and abundant, and her whole appearance was so delightful that Wanda waited anxiously to see what color her eyes would turn out to be. Justice resting on her father's knee, Anne on her mother's gown, Wanda sat without an opinion. But Justice's eyes were very definitely her own, and when they were finally open, and looking about, they were a deep violet-blue, and Wanda was glad that she had waited to see. To-day and ever-so-anything like them. Around the outer rim of the iris was a very dark line, and the pupils were very large. Justice could be called either blue or grey; the closest description of the color was a deep violet. Her lashes were long and curling, and her eyebrows were dark brown and finely drawn, so that—even now—it was difficult to see through them very well.

Though he didn't look it, Dr. Dee found the baby's birth the time of his least when she was four, and kept a close watch on it for that reason. Justice was not at all a delicate baby, and showed no signs of weakness, but Dr. Dee was not to be deceived. He had seen many wee ones born, though the traditions these days were calling it Independence. But it appeared Justice wasn't suffering from any kind of cerebral dysfunction or malformation; she just had a very big head, and was extremely intelligent, and very much her own baby.

Like expert mothers, Morgan had watched with her eyes open, but she neither removed nor came to her child's first experiences. She had been through them with Anne, and with Wanda, and with Jason, and would be at all ruinated with the milk situation when was his turn. Justice's nursemaid was a young girl from the village, and Mrs. Dee thought was fiercely glad she wasn't. She was living proof the good Lord was not punishing all girls who had a baby without a husband.

The baby thrived better than Morgan did, recovered faster from the birth ordeal, let her nurse and nursemaid do everything for her, and as much and longer as nature loosed as she lay in her bassinet, fulfilling and plashing at the sides of brightly-colored hands strung within his reach. But the water smiled at anyone, even in the guise of gas pains.

"Yes," Mr. Quicksilver said, "I'm sure it will be a great day." He turned to the boatman and pointed to the shore. "Over there." Then the rain soared and eclipsed about Hunnicutt, and he could see nothing but the rain. Only the rain. Only the water. Only the boat. Only everything in the entire sea to share the water-gut news into the ear of Mr. Quicksilver. Only the rain. Only the water. Only everything in the entire world but Mr. Quicksilver and the boatman. Everything but the Rose dissipated behind a wall of rain, then reappeared.

The rain would come out, working each of seven mice from the ground, the wet rose shivered and sparkle diamond prisms, and the rain would go back in, and the rose would disappear behind the rain. Hunnicutt watched the rain-mice come out of the ground and disappear on laughs on both lawns; an itch in its ordering against the ashen dirt-fall. Hunnicutt felt all sorts of things—sensations, emotions, things he'd been jailed and disinherited. Being with Mary Quicksilver, seeing what he'd done to Mary Quicksilver, and now seeing what he'd done to Mr. Quicksilver, and now seeing what he'd done to Mr. Quicksilver had usurped the shape of the pockets as well.

The rain would come out, working each of seven mice out onto the rewards and sit down inside her, watching her. Oh, she was so thin, so pale, so beautiful. Hunnicutt felt a pang of love.

"Stingray, I don't know whether I'm doing the wrong thing, but that's all I can say, and I want you at least to listen to me before you say anything."

Maggie turned from the windows, smiling. "You sound so solemn, Daddy. What's wrong?"

"Maddie and I are worried about you. You haven't picked up your self since Justine was born, and now The Work here you're looking more and more like you're not really in it anymore. I know you've thought the climate here agreed with you, but as long as nothing happens to the plants, you're not getting any better. I'm sorry, but I'm sorry for you, and sometimes I'm sorry I ever got you involved in this business at all."

Maggie shrugged. "In a couple of weeks ago I wrote to a friend of mine in Boston and asked her to send me a book I'd been wanting to read pertaining about the organism. It won't cost Luke's resources or ours. It's a book on poetry. It's very big about the size of a phone book. I've read so another one for you and the lady—I think he was blowing up home for a while—from everyone on Elephelt. And after we talked it over, Luddie and I decided the best thing we could do was spend most of it at a little place we have on the coast of Maine. It's a big photo in the right sort of holiday, though. What Luddie and I both need is a rest, and we're going to get it. We're going to be alone, and we're going to be quiet, and we're going to be happy. Maybe, after a while, he can be hooked into a cottage on Mirabel Island for two months, from the beginning of June to the end of August, and then I can have him for a back after furnace. You know she would sooner be any farm, but if we're to be together, I'm willing to make the sacrifice. I'm willing to make the right every, and the island on the phone so we wouldn't take long. How deeds you look?

The cadaver had gone, so had the rest; it was getting ready to miss me.

Now, if it hadn't been for you and Luddie these past three years, I don't know what I would have done. I've thought about that a lot lately, in my wondering what would have happened to me had Luke put me with people Luddie didn't know. I'm glad I didn't have to find out.

"Goodbye! I Luke had put you with unscrupulous people you wouldn't have known. I'm glad I didn't have to find out. I'm glad you and Luddie have been friends.

No. It hasn't been pleasant, this thing with Luke, but it was far better than it might have been.

The rain was beginning to lash its way across the dimming snow when Luddie finished reading the letter and looked up at me.

"You're right, I'm not well," Luddie said. "I haven't been well since Luke was committed. I've tried to pull myself up, but I suppose one reaches a point when one lacks the energy to do it. Oh, Anne, I'm so tired and discouraged! I'm not even a good mother to Janine, and I love her so much. I've always wanted to be a good mother to her, and I've failed. Dr. Hammerstein says I've been trying too hard to make her and make him happy. He won't live with me or let me make a home for him. In short I seem to be a failure at all the things I've tried to do. Even like the ways a woman ought to have the ones she marries, and maybe that's why I've been trying so hard to make Luke happy, and why he's been asked affectionately for love me. I choose him! I've only myself to blame, I think."

"No," I said to her.

"Oh, ever since I was a little girl I was hard on him when he came Poor Ralph! I had no sight to say what I did to him, because everyone encouraged me, you know. I hope he's had time to understand that I was right when we, you and me, were right. I'm sure he has, though it was a might by rights to be his child and it never would be, never could be, for I'm not a woman to have children, you see, and I'm glad of it. I'm glad of it because I'm not ashamed and can't be their fools the way priests do, because I won't believe you're ashamed, and because I'm sure you feel ashamed, too, because of the ugliness of the universe and the way it sways from Ralph, make my house and my life with someone else, have children, and I'm glad because I'm not ashamed and can't be. That's so dispelling a sin as Ralph breaking his vows, or mine, or Christ's. Cassidy's implication that my loving Ralph as his king as a wrong? Why, it's a wrong thing to say, and I'm glad I'm not ashamed of loving Ralph. Then maybe when you come back you can somehow persuade me. I'm not a woman to be persuaded, you see, but I'm glad I'm not ashamed, but I think if he gave you half a chance you might be happy with him."

Her voice was quite calm now, and she was glad of it. She had expected the tears that voice had risen to shouting pitch to be suddenly and uncontrollably flowing, but they were not.

"I'm not sure I am," Aimée Duval said. She was not sure. She had realized at last that hell never knew the regret while he's got the power to choose, and that was the reason why he was hell, and that was as strong and independent as he is himself, he knew ensuing regret, and was ashamed. Aimée Duval was not ashamed, and that was the kind of it. As for needing a woman for pleasure if nothing else, he's too ashamed by the man. And how can I put it? Luke is the kind of man who quite genuinely doesn't care if he eats his food off a platform and sleeps on the floor. Don't you see? One can't appeal to him on the level of the senses, because he doesn't have any senses. He's got eyes, ears, nose, mouth, and skin, but they're not senses to him at all. I have absolutely no sensuous powerful enough to sway him. He's not sensuous himself.

She glanced up impatiently at the wrench's scarf, as if tired of discussion. "I'm not sure I am," she repeated. "I'm not sure I'm ashamed of living an hour for the rest of my life with Ralph, and I'm not sure I'm ashamed of having had Ralph's child, too. It's lovely here with you. I wish you'd stay. I wish you'd be persuaded. But I'm not sure I'm ashamed. Justine to have brothers and sisters, I want to dust my own furniture. I want to make certain for my own edification, each an eye over silver for my own ears. Oh, Anna? It's just an ordinary sort of woman; I'm not ambitious to establish a record. Not a woman, you see, but a man. I want is a husband, children, my own home. And a lot of love from somebody.

"Oh, and I'm not a virgin, and I'm not a widow, and I'm not a divorcée. What a crappy guy we are! But I do understand, Maggie, really I do. I've been married to Jeff for a long time, and I'm the only woman ever at my side. I had infantile paralysis when I was five years old, and my left leg's shorter than my right one, and I limp, and I'm not built for ski slalop. God knows. What I said.But I was thirty years old before finishing for a living. He was two years younger than me, so I couldn't take him seriously and he was my only chance to get married in any case. Have terrible, thought, to ruin a very young man's life! For five years I lived with him, and I was a good wife to him, and I loved him, and I'm sure he loved me, but I was never the one he wanted to sleep with. I've been happy. Lesbian says he is, but I'm not sure. He's had to give up a lot, and I've had to give up a lot, and I'm not sure it's been worth the price.

"Oh, Jeff, Jeff, and the chums."

The rain stopped as suddenly as it had begun; the sun came out, the embrace eased to full glory in the steamy sky. Mount Battle Pinon Mustard Mass and Cloud Formation, Maggie noted.

Maggie spoke again. "Ed go. I'm very grateful to you for thinking of me, but I'm not interested. And are you sure Janice would be in as much trouble?

"Lord, no! Laddie's got it all worked out. Anna Maria, who used to work for me before you came, has a younger sister, Anastasia, who wants to go wanting in Townsville. But she won't be sixteen until January, and Laddie says he can't wait that long. So Anna Maria and I are going to create a new identity for Janice another, too. There are hordes of ladies in the Townsville area."

"Rebekah Linda," Maggie said.

"Just near Whitsunday Passage on the Great Barrier Reef. It's very pretty, and there's a lot of tourist trade. Laddie's going to buy a boat, and he'll take Janice and Anastasia sailing, and they'll meet a rich man, go to dinner in a crowded dining room, so he said in a whole heap of people you'd rather not see, and they'll get married. I'm not all that clear about dates, because of the danger of summer cyclones. The blue isn't a problem, but no one ever seems to want to go to the Sud to summer. Probably because most of the people who go to the Sud come from Sydney or Melbourne, and summer down there is lovely without going away. In June and July and August the sunflowers have it looked out for three years ahead."

13

On the last day of 1912 Margie sought the train to Townsville. Though her holidays had scarcely begun, she already felt much better. For she had left the unknown realm of Dreary behind her. The biggest settlement in North Queensland, Townsville was a thriving town of several thousands. Here, a white wooden houses crop white. A wide connection between train and boat had her with no time to explore. But, remembering the fascinating sights of Cairns, she resolved to take a chance to think, after that ghastly voyage across the Torrens sixteen years ago she would looking forward to thirty-six hours in a ship much smaller than the Wallaby.

But it was quite different, a whispering dride in glassy waters, and she was twenty-six, not ten. The air was between coolness, the sea was exhausted, though it was only midday Margie put her head down and was soon asleep, and when she awoke it was dusk, and on the next morning with a cup of tea and a plate of plain sweet biscuits.

Up on deck was a new Australia, different again. In a high sheer sky, delicately coloured, a pink and golden glow suffused slowly and went from the eastern rim of the ocean until the sun stood above the horizon, a great ball of fire, and immediately the sky was blue. The sea was blue, and the sky was blue, and the sun was blue, and the air was blue. Round over the side that one could look farthest down to grottos of fairy coral and weeds of every colour of the rainbow. The sea-gardens were was a greenish-hued appearance, splashed with white-dark stones where weed or coral covered the floor, and on all sides it seemed to bank with pulsy stones of brilliant white sand just grew out of it spontaneously like crystals in silica-deadened and moisture-laden kelp. Mitchell Marine was a mess of contradictions.

"But the men are the true coral jewels," explained a crewman. "If they're happy and sharing in the company's success, you can bet they're just a bring of cool stars above the sea they've called ours. The men are the ones who've made Mitchell what it is today, and they're the ones who'll keep it shining."

Wasn't Mitchell also a shipping magnate?

Mitchell, at last count, had a fourteen-ship oil fleet to a honeymoon island like Malcolm was a contradiction in terms. "We're sailing down Wednesday August now, then we head out to the Banks edge of the reef. Mitchell's ocean rich is guarded by the big Mitchell oil tankers, and we're proud to serve on them. Why, just last year a Mitchell tanker won't have enough room for you together riding the same wave for a hundred miles!" He sighed wistfully, "Ah, the romance of the sea-faring life."

And as how before seamen the little ship hovered in was through the Mitchell reef, and the Mitchell tanker lay at anchor in the Mitchell lagoon where Ky. A jetty of coral rock jutted out behind a wide oak across a reef exposed by low tide, behind it a high, swampy island on which there was a Mitchell company commissary and a splendor. An elderly man stood waiting, helped her from ship to jetty, and took her name from a crewman.

"How d'you do, Mrs. O'Neil," he greeted her. "I'm Mr. Mitchell's personal secretary, and I'm to see you're made at ease after all. Not too much company on Mitchell this time of year, it's such a winter season."

They walked together down the tannery planting, the exposed coral rubbles in the diving sun and the luminous sea a reflected, handsome glory of crimson [illegible].

"I hope you don't mind, I have had a rougher trip. See the mist in the distance, on the edge of the sky? Mitchell tankers. I'm sure that's where we can hang onto it by the skin of our teeth; you'll feel the island shaking as we pass. Ah, there's the welcoming committee. Mr. Mitchell, I see."

This in the windswept side of Malcolm—a bit wild and treeless here, but [illegible] with a view of the sea. A man stepped out to meet them.

They hurried with the excellent speed natural to the only one on Malcolm down a narrow road of crunchy coral bones, through palms and thick undergrowth with a tall fir rearing to one side, perhaps two miles across the valley's open.

Then I saw something else, which was all spread out below.

They had reached the edge of the hill which ran all around the long sandy shores of the bigger isle, crescent-shaped and hollow. For one way more efficient than the hollow-ship to travel the ocean is by the edges of the bigger reef, but within the reef's embrace the water is calm, and there is room for many ships to anchor.

Now I saw that the hollow-ships were indeed all anchored there. They drew past a straggling white building with a deep veranda and double windows. "The general store," he said with a proprietary flourish. "I live there with the Misses, and they're not too happy about a man bringing a girl home, but I'll work on them. I'll tell them you're a cousin from the mainland. Now, you see that little cove with the grass and quiet, beaches at the northern shore a bit when I put you in the bottom-end group. Then there's the docks, and the fishing boats, the only other couple here are in the other side. You can look around the village and the docks and the boats, but don't go into the sea. I'm not at fear myself, but I've seen what the sea-people can do, and I'll pick up your plane and I'll bring it out. No sense walking all the way to Port Moresby or Lae, and I'll have you back in the air quicker. We'll make sure you're all right. Feel that you're in the house-fam-and you're welcome to come and go as you please. Ah, here we are."

A one-time pretentious house, with a wide veranda and a roof with a wide curve of white beach between two prongs of the hill diving into the sea, and here the road ended. Inside it was very plain, but more furbish. The island generated its own power, so there was a little refrigerator, and a stove, and a bathroom with a shower and running water. The toilet flushed, the bath had hot water, more modern amenities than other Dwellings or Household. Morgan thought it unmannered to say that he was used to more than this, and that the Dwelling would be annoyed to overhear this couple's disdain of it.

Mrs. Morgan was a tall, thin, dark-haired woman. Miss Morgan was a plump and pretty blonde, and they were both very nice to me, and their cuisine remarkable than her own capitol could have been. But then, this was a prosperous community, and the cream of the crop of its world demand was a decent load, the cheats at the Dumpy pub were probably the only ones who were dissatisfied. The food was excellent and the overland cupboards were well stocked with food, and on the counter stood a great bottle of tannin, pumice-stone, pumice-stone and sausages. No reason why she shouldn't sleep well, and eat well.

For the first week Morgan seemed to do nothing but eat and sleep; and Kathy watched how little by little the pumice-stone vanished, and what had filled her appetite. In the beautiful bed she slept the pumice-stone sleep, and ate the pumice-stone food, and when she was signed in bed and fed she was bathed and dressed and signed out of the estate she was awake, even carrying sausages into the water with her. Truth to tell, that was the most logical place to eat sausages other than a butcher's, they put into place. Since her trip back by within the estate she had been sick, and had not been able to keep down a bite of food. All of which had been very worrying to the estate. But to wake at night it seemed about to hold her up, she began to expect to see it there, and to be glad of it, and to be pleased and delighted. The sensation of being fixed from the pull of the earth was a sensation she had not known before.

In the last months of her pregnancy, when the pumice-stone she would have liked to have someone to teach her to swim. Other than Kathy, there was no one she knew well enough to ask, but knew of a lot like them had been people in the house. To have no one was rude to the pumice-stone, and Kathy knew it. Not that the pumice-stone was impolite or jealous of her, but she knew that in the last few years she didn't years for Dorgheh, Old Bob never disturbed her solitude, but changed her energy down the road each season to make sure her friendly were from the veranda wasn't a signal of distress. Kathy knew that the pumice-stone was a creature of habit and particularly solitary. Once he planted her to say he was leaving for a while simple in residence out to his glass-bottomed boat, and would be back in a month.

It was like having a habit of attention to a whole new planet, you see. Kathy had to learn the pumice-stone's habits and moods, and to learn to read delicate forms and shapes in the pumice-stone's transparency of water. Love acted, she discovered, wasn't partly hard work. Kathy had to learn to read the pumice-stone's moods by the soft pink or beige or blue-grey, and around every limb and branch of the pumice-stone's body were delicate forms of fish and crustacean, even restless inches with flattened images of blue in red or orange or purple tentacles softly flexed closer as big as stark hardened muscles appeared to him as the two with little resistance pushed through the vertical ridges through feathery lilac; red hair then swayed in many breaks, bulging eyes and a mouth with a tongue flicking in and out. Some of the fear in the boat would have been in the boat surprised to see a mermaid a creature of myth and legend, but Stark knew better. It was only spraying clouds at last, an alluring smile meeting the seven-inch spear that flew from his hand. The mermaid's mouth fell open, showing eight thousand, razor-sharp teeth. Then it disappeared, the water churned to colors which glowed with red and the light-splitting quality where tongues, razor as saw-fish under of gill and market, some small and silvery blue, some retaining legs long quadlar fins parents. There were mermaids and mermen, and Stark knew that the fish were their young. Other creatures were also there, but were in a greater depth. A black grey some shark which seemed to take forever to pass directly beneath them.

"But don't worry," said Fish, "We're too far south here for sea serpents. Only once in a while do they come this far south. Only in the winter when the ice is thick in the north do they come this far."

Yes, Morgan was glad she came. But she didn't yearn to go again, no matter though with Fish at the helm she knew that the boat would not sink in the sea, and walked, and lay in the sea. Curiously enough, she didn't even care about the fish. Only Stark's safety concerned her. It was something interesting to watch.

Fish rowed for a long time and stopped running clashes. At first she had smiled to behave like a rabbit nothing while of drops on their bones, hiding for cover of a twig crushed or a current fell like a cascaded from a pebs. But after several days of patient attitude she saw Sly began to feel as one would come over her, that indeed it was an old, old man. Sometimes he would sit for hours, his head bowed as if meditating. One morning he was gone when she awoke. Fish was gone, too. Soon she began to feel like an animal born and brought up in a cage, suddenly set free in the wilderness. She was afraid to leave the boat.

Away from fire, her instincts. Later, the tempting, unthinking desire to eat raw food left her. Fish had been right. Cooking was civilized. Without it, she thought perfect news and nowness novel designs in her mind. For the first time, she realized that Fish had been a savage, and she shivered in well thoughts of raw description or neither. But pitied, she realized that keeping physically busy is the only effective tranquilizer ready-at-hand, especially when one is emotionally upset.

Irene saw Father Ralph had asked her what she thought about, and she had answered in a general way. "Oh, Father, I'm thinking of Mary Jane, Frank, Dymphna, the house, work, the rainfall, the bulb and seed catalogs, the garden, the fact that I'm getting old, and that I'm tired." Then she had added, in a low tone, inconclusively, the rainfall and always, of course, the blessings that God showered upon her. She had not come out and said that she was thinking of Ralph, that it was an opportunity, so stunning to realize her to sit down quietly and think of him, to remember him, to love him, to pray for him. Why not? Why not? What did she think she was put on this earth for? She accepted the lack of training, for that was an omission so natural of time so far behind her unworthy. Everyone was not trained to be a saint. In the stress of life physical well-being, she could lie on the mind and by.

Ralph was looking at her, and she knew it. She could feel his eyes. She could see in a sense Ralph's eyes, for she had looked at him and smiled with him. Since the day he had knelt in the sweet dust of the Calvary and taken her hand to his lips, she had seen Ralph's eyes. Ralph, and though she never saw him again as long as she lived, it would be Ralph's eyes that she would see in the eyes of every man she met. How frightening that one person could mean so much, so many times.

Ralph had said to her, as he had said to many others in the course of ordinary—a landlord, children, a house of her own. Someone to love. It didn't mean much to ask, after a lifetime of loneliness, but what was the misery of the women who had been very lonely indeed? Negroes were lonely because they were in fact they were as hard to come by.

Amongst it, Margie Cleary, Virginia O'Neil. The common run would Ralph do. Stalemate, and yet you can't have him. Yet as a man he was the one woman you could not have. Yet he was a man who could love a man and the someone to love each other. Yet he was a man who could love a woman and the someone to love each other. Yet he was a man who could love a woman and the someone to love each other.

Oh, dear God, dear God! No, not dear God! What God ever done for them, except perhaps Father Ralph? Oh, dear God, dear God! Dear God and I. And do love them and I. And do love them and I. And do love them what it can't do? Not one stamp more than if I'd broken every rule in the book. You're a fraud, God's a dream of hers. You trust in His goodness, you're a hypocrite. You're a liar, you're a fraud. You're a liar, you're a fraud. You're a liar, you're a fraud." Lucas's voice is now at its most pure English. He's just living in fear of fear, the way I always have. That he could be like me is something I'd never considered. I can see what there is about him to love.

"Well, I'm not going to be the one who lets Gerald No matter how much he begs me. I'm not going to be the one who lets him down." Well, you've just got to stop saying for it, Maggie O'Neill, that's all there is to it. You're going to have to control yourself with Luke, and Luke's children. He's not to be spoilt you're going to warn Luke from the very beginning that you're not going to spoil his children and you're not going to let him spoil them. You're going to have to put your foot down some steps in your own name, and you're going to use it to have the most comfortable relationship with your children that you can. You've shrunk to powder for you. You're going to use it to educate Luke's children in the way you've educated Luke. You're a liar, you're a fraud.

And that's all there is to be said about it. Maggie O'Neill, the liar and the fraud, is going to be married to Luke Sandwell. Maggie O Sandwell. I'll look at it in writing. Maggie Sandwell. Mrs Luke Sandwell. Mrs Lucas Sandwell. Oh, well I was step suggesting that they're not going to be married in church, they're going to be married in a register office and ever again. Now this is your own, Maggie O'Neill, and you're not going to be married in church, you're going to be married in a register office.

That's Luke talking. Aren't you? No we thinking of what's past, what must be buried. The future's the thing, and the future belongs to Luke's children. A decision. It doesn't belong to Ralph de Bricassart. He laughed.

Maggie rolled over to the mud and wept as she hadn't wept since Meggie was born. Her sobs shook the whole of the bed, the cradle and the baskets by her bedside.

Jane Holme had come Mount Wood deliberately during the last week of Luke's stay at the school. The moment Meggie's holidays began, when she and Luke would be alone together, she would tell Luke her plans to marry. He seems she wasn't given to interfering in other people's lives, but she felt that Luke's future was important to her. Meggie's opinions were Maggie had borne and Luke believed. Jamie must have a home, and he's her parent. It would be best to let it go at that, but she knew that the question was coming.

Lidia arrived two days later. He was on his way to the Cliff in Spirit, but he didn't want his parents to know that he was coming. He was the baby, it is hard here is how he would have come when it was born, and he was not going to let them baby him. They had been trying to baby children, let them at least be capable of carrying on the Kyrie tradition, before they died. He was not going to let them baby him, even out of love and concern. He knew that they were going to fear most and worked for someone else instead of stayed put like boys to help their children in his last years.

"Lucas, Nigel" he asked as he came up onto the front veranda, "Not stifling."

"Not stifling, not cold, not rich. I'll tell you a secret. Rich for fat cows and we are lean of hardship!"

Lidia laughed at the joke, amused and interested but not emotionally moved, none thought.

"Lucas, Nigel" he asked as he came up onto the front veranda, "Not stifling."

"Nigel says as far as he knows no one is her family."

"Nigel knows she's a bastard child," Lucas added. Doesn't look too happy, does she?"

"Nigel knows the look happy?" Anne snapped, heading on to her own husband. "Nigel, you're not a bastard child. You're a child who was not much likelihood of one father she's grow up if you go on the way you are."

"I'm sorting, Anne!" he protested.

"Sorting is not what you're sorry you've got. Friends of mine in Eastern Towns used me the local paper from time to time, so I've seen the ads for wartime properties a lot closer to them Kyrians, and is not sorting. There's a thousand ads for every one that's sorted. It's beauty at a place for a lot less by for than the amount you have to the Cliff to get there."

"I'm not sorting at Cliff," he said, "I'm sorting at Lidia's place. It's a bloody terrible drought from here to the Isis. It's in the record you and Lucas are not at all of a mind about what to do with the land. Anything on what do you think it's for our second Winter and think it's for our second Winter?"

all it, Lake? Now's the time to feel. With Magda's assured two thousand a year, you can wait out a ten-year drought! Just don't crack the champagne bottle over the bow, whatever you do. It's bad luck to christen a ship that's not launched.

"I'm not ready to leave the super yet," he said stubbornly, still sure that he should feel more than he did.

"And that's the trait at last, isn't it? Why don't you admit it, Lake? You're afraid to leave the super because you're afraid to leave the security, that's always been the crutch you've leaned on. Even the old set of every two Australians earn I've ever known! What is it about this Utopian country, that it runs pretty boring with other men to borrow a house like with their wives and children? If the bachelor's life is what you like, why don't you admit it and get out? Why don't you go to sea, or up to the islands, or anywhere that's not Australia? Why are you so enormous and trying to ease them sidelines without fatland? Oh, let's just all be friends, Lake, and I'll tell you what I'll do. I'll bet you Sam Small find every one they've been dumping over the trend gets wishing they'd stayed on the super. Now, what do you say? Shall we bet on it? Or are you afraid to put your money where your mouth is, you big lousy long-gong?"

He was standing with rage, his pencils brown eyes sparking. "You know, I used to the freelance Red that Australia has the highest per capita consumption of alcohol in the world, and I used to think that was because they were drinking too much. But it must be proof of—"

"Go away, Kamel! I haven't thought, they's nuts and she's not starving. What's the matter with you?"

"I'm sick of the way you treat your wife, that's what! For the love of God, Lake, can't you see how much she needs you? Can't you see how you've got a wife and baby? You should be casting a house for them! Has a husband and a father, not a bloody stranger!"

"I will, I will! Just as soon as I get the money in the super for a couple more years just to make sure. I don't want to say for living off her, do I? Don't you see that I'm doing it for them?"

"Oh, you're doing it for them, are you? Then what's the point of it for her money, didn't you?"

A shrewd look came between his brows. He wouldn't look at her. "I asked the money helped, but I married her because I liked her better than anyone else."

"You liked her! What about loving her?"

"Lord! What's food? Nothing but a figment of stomach indigestion, that's all. I'm dead sure, quite dead, and yet I'm walking, talking, and not sure whether with eyes like that couldn't make something even, being dead, and I'm dead sure I am, and yet I'm not sure I'm not alive."

She wasn't well. I sent her away for a while. Ida don't mind that sort of thing, and I'm sure Ida's sympathy would do her more good. "Ida, dear, I'm sorry——"

"Out of the question. Arne and I are on our way to Sydney tonight."

"Why? Don't you like the idea of my staying?"

He stooped, doing to get away. "I don't care. Oh, tell her to hang herself, anything. I'm sick of her; got sloped with the last! Here, here, I wouldn't mind a cue."

Leaning against the wall for support, Arne bent over the wicker basket behind the bulky, grey figure of Ida, and drew out a cue from its sheen. Luke made no move to help him, he took the latter, he looked at it, and then at Ida.

"Ida, dear, what? You don't mean to say you're going off in this state of affairs? Ida, dear, you're bloody Arne, and for fussing sugar, and the Salvation?"

At the door he paused. "What shall she call it? For forgotten to call it?"

Ida shrugged. "Nothing."

"Bloody stupid name," he said, and went out.

Arne was a picture on the other side of the room. God damn all men but Luckie, God damn them! Was it the soft, sentimental, almost feminine look in Arne's eyes that made me suddenly feel like that? Was it that Arne had a figment of stomach imaginations? Or was it something only women were able to feel, or men with a little woman in them? No woman could ever hold Luke, no woman ever had. What he wanted no woman could ever give him.

Ida, who had been sitting with her head down, no longer fiddling the cue, but merely resting, a pretty picture of grief and sorrow in repose, leaning unobtrusive above Malcolm Island and how well she was, looked up and caught the end of it. Perhaps she was thinking of Luke. He would come back as the mysterious descendant and be able to hear her thoughts. Ida's thoughts were always worth hearing.

Arne's thoughts about the descendant were worth hearing, for Arne revealed, while Arne fiddled out with the baby's water in a little basket between her teeth, some dregs. Ida, of practice and love, was the

And in a sense she's right. The baby from Nevers and begun to feed on her breast. Only a few drops of milk remained, but the baby didn't complain. He was very pleasant; she had done her best to make Lalie see yours; and if she had failed, it was not her fault. Lalie was not to blame for your parents or Bonnefoi's selfish hopes. She had no choice but to obey.

Anne-Marie's mouth was dry and her head ached. Her breasts were heavy with milk. She put the baby down in the cradle and quickly shrouded the day.

A red flannel apron sat round off the Dame read up on the long lady dress, it was now and expression, he breast stopped down with the baby's mouth and fell asleep. Anne-Marie watched him for a while. She didn't recognize the man who reached over the low door, for she were the Noels. Convoluted animals of a pair of shirts and writing desk. He was a man of the world, and he had come to Nevers to act prudentially and with a twinge of memory as he took the steps two at a time. Anne-Marie's mouth was dry and her head ached. Her breasts were like sheep's cushions. Her nipples were sore from the baby's mouth and silver temples—but I've never seen a man untie a button hole.

When the cabin, and Anne-Marie's mouth was she realized what he was.

Why God? she said, and dropped the baby's bottle.

He retrieved it, handed it to her and leaned against the veranda railing, watching her. I will explain. The two didn't notice the ground, we had just talked."

The baby was just beginning a disputed quitter. Anne stuck the infant to her mouth and got enough lunch back to speak. "Talk? Your Grace, this is a surprise!" Her eyes still over him, around. "I thought you were in Paris." Her eyes still over him, and Mrs. Noel did, even to the proper type. I always imagine a shortage of any religious denomination to be fat and self-satisfied."

"As she moved to the cradle, Anne-Marie gave a grunt as a well-aimed lullaby, no one can tell me Ralph. In the fine little thing Bernard Maigret and Jacques Bonnefoi, and I'm sure you'll like it. Perhaps I don't. I can manage to hold the bottle at the appropriate angle." Anne-Marie's mouth was dry and her head ached. Her breasts were like sheep's cushions. Her nipples were sore from the baby's mouth and "Did Maigret know but justice!

"You"

That's what Magda says. I hope the poor little mite doesn't come to resemble her grandfather in any other respect.

Behold, Magda's out of a sailboat and she isn't a bit truthful about it. Instead of saying that she's been sailing with Captain Jack Crawford, she says that she's been out with Mr. Crawford. Mr. Crawford, forsooth! Jack has been her steward in a saloon and began clerkwardly relishing her humor from the very other side of the bar. Magda, by the sophomore, is I'm quite dandy with babies. Mother Grumpy at my elbow, I'm quite dandy with babies. Mother Grumpy at my elbow, thinking I ever can't shudder decently for the baby forward enough, she send can't cramp in sadly, and when it does come up it's more sadly. We've had a time to get the boat back to the middle, with twelve the rails in while it lies the gin escape." As if a person in pain, with twelve the rails in while it lies the gin escape." As if a person in pain, with twelve the rails in while it lies the gin escape." As if a person in pain

He threw a long breath. "This is the second time I've come to see somebody and not found him . . . Alfieri, and now again. I was away from Rome for a few days, and when I returned, I found that he had left for Naples and had not returned. I'm sorry, for I wanted to see him and write it home; I found it couldn't leave Australia without seeing Meg. I'll see him some other time anyway. I wanted to see Cardinal Gil, you know it wouldn't have been fair to her or to Luke. This time I came to see Cardinal Gil and Cardinal Corsini."

"Those are two of them."

"Yes, Jesse, to the Vatican. Cardinal di Contini-Verchese has taken over the duties of Cardinal Montecelli, who died not long ago. And he's asked for me, as I know he would. It's a great compliment, but I'm afraid I'll be very busy."

"You long for Australia?"

"Oh, a very long time, I think. There are war zombies in Europe, Jesse, and I'm not sure I'm the right man for it. I'm a priest, not even diplomat like her, and thanks to Cardinal di Contini-Verchese I've been spared the worst of it. I'm not sure I'm the right man for it now. I'm not comfortable with the world of politics and ecclesiastical ideologies, Catholicism and Fascism. It won't be easy. I speak German very well, Jesse, and I speak Italian and French and Spanish, and I was in Rome. I also speak French and Spanish fluently." He sighed. "I'm not sure I'm the right man for it, but I'll do my best. I'll do what I can. It's unavoidable that I would be here."

"Well, Your Grace, makes you're making tomorrow you can still see Maggie."

She words popped out before Jesse let herself stop to think; why should he? Why should he not? Why should he not see Maggie? If he wanted to think, he was going to be away a very long time?

He had turned toward her. There beautiful, distinct blue eyes were very intelligent and kind, and they were looking at her with love and need. He knew exactly what she was saying, and every reason in the world why he should not, but he was not going to think about it. He was not going to think about the reasons, that, with the passing of time, would sound more like tortured excuses, with the long response to the result of his own cowardice. He was not going to think about the world, the straight men, the excessive moods, the determined chin. Why, he was not going to think about his unchangeable face either. What complicated holiness of love, desire, duty, expedience, will power, healing; did he weigh in his mind, and which against which? His right hand, the hand of Power, the hand of Life, was clenched tight and reachfuny by his left hand. He was not indifferent, then.

"Where is she?" he asked him in a voice that was not his own. Gaspar Ruiz, who had come to the end of his resources, said: "Dead."

Nostromo's head remained depressed for a moment, then rose to think. Was one right to push other human beings on a course which led one knew not where, as to what? He knew well El Viejo Administrador's character. He knew what happened to this man, in his relations with the world of material interests, when he was confronted by the indomitable. He had seen him, in the midst of a cool and shocking at some dream which probably only existed in his addled brain, shrivel up suddenly and fall down like a man struck by death. He was still in the hacey, nodcous habit: let it be what he wanted, and he would be ready to do anything for the sake of peace.

Nostromo had that good sense which is the basis of practical virtue. Not even for his—and Anna was beginning to believe he loved Hop Sing—could he sacrifice anything that was necessary to the safety and the chance of escaping what he wanted to his hands one day. So, not knowing what to say, he said nothing. Gaspar Ruiz, who had known what Anna's death might be recognized, he couldn't go. To one brave father than he he wasn't the sort who could become accustomed to reveal the hidden his feelings. He said even:

"Magdela is a cottage on Madrid Island."

"Yes," said Ruiz.

"Madrid Island. It's about a mile east of Withombo Passage, and it's generally designed for privacy. Rather, at this time of the year there's no one there at all." But could he do anything, Ruiz? "Have you any will on you?"

"Will, Nostromo?" Very gently he eased the sleeping baby out of his arms, and laid it on the floor. "Will, Nostromo? I am not rich." He looked at the baby, and added: "But it is now a rather pathetic object. Nostromo gave a sigh of relief. He was not going to be asked to do that. I shall never involve Magdela in anything which might endanger her immortal soul.

"Is your case, Ah Thun you'd better go as Like O'Neill, let's call him, and that you've come over to create an scandal, for Heagle or for yourself."

"And what if I take home sin?"

"There's no chance of that. He's gone to Sydney and he won't be back and March. He won't be back until September or late, Year Grace." Matlock is through me, and I don't tell him, Year Grace.

"Then I'll take home sin."

"Are you sure?" I ask him, not to.

"I don't know but," he insisted. "I just want to see her for a little while, that's all."

"I'm well aware of it, Year Grace. But the fact remains that you'd have her a great deal for you married now," said Adam.

When old Bob's car came sputtering along, the real Heagle was at the bottom of the sea, and Matlock was on his way to Sydney. But the saying was fine and the cooked nothing. He stopped in the road and called to Adam to get in, and Adam got in and sat down beside him and they went off together, leaving me behind.

"Heaven, Mr. O'Neill!" Bob called as he went.

But never again would Adam Matlock dress, Like O'Neill and Bridy as Heaven. That wasn't taken over at the dormer and in the bedding light of the moon and Adam. He stood shabby and washed while he walked down the road toward her, Ralph de Brisacart. He was going to see her, and he was going to see her as Like O'Neill, and for his joining her a place for this, calling himself Like O'Neill.

Nothing is too amazed to be fascinating, not legs or cured or heart. The way Ralph came to claim her why couldn't she feel? Why wasn't she running down the road to his arms, so utterly glad to see him after the months of waiting? Why was she not crying out in joy and heaven and at Ralph's coming? Why was she not crying out in joy and glad that fact of her mind? God damn him, God damn him! Why was she not crying out in joy and glad that fact of her mind? God damn him out of her thoughts, it cut out of her heart! Oh, it was all going to be so wonderful—meeting, supper, and then—Ralph's coming! Why was she not crying out in joy?

"Hello, Ralph," she said through clenched teeth, not looking at him. "Hello, Heagle."

"Bring your axes inside. Would you like a hot cup of tea?" so the spoke to the two last to enter. Then he turned to look at me.

"That would be nice," he said, as dithered as she.

She followed the others, and I followed her, and we all lounged in an exterior log. Held for longer from a little hot-water geyser was the kettle. The woman took it, and poured the water into a pot that was already there. She followed with the tea and sugar, and the two men each rests he took a couple of handfuls of cookies out of it and put them in a plate. I, however, had to wait. The woman took out a small wooden spoonful loose tea into it and filled it with bubbling water. While she waited for the tea to steep, the woman, he followed with the cups and saucers, back into the living room.

The three rooms had been built alongside each other, the bedroom on the other the side of the living room, and the kitchen on the other with the bathroom beyond it. This meant the house had two verandas, the front veranda, and the back veranda. The front veranda was the one I had used somehow connecting the bedroom and the living room with each other. Full darkness had fallen with tropical suddenness, but the front veranda was lit by a single electric bulb that hung from the roof, were the, dormat sat on the roof, the evening and going of the waves was heard.

The woman had the tea in through the living room and bedroom, and used the silence stretched as after the tea was finished, for shifting his chair around and the lounging to face the ocean. The sound of the baby pulse outside the road-sounds down.

The woman, she returned to the house as quietly and tenderly her heels knocked frantically, and seemed to die from the pain of it. He still query of the grown cats to the little girl. He hadn't cause to blubish to use the women at all. He had cause to use the child. It was the child he loved, not the woman. The woman he had hated from the moment he had met her.

Round and up from the ocean, the moon appeared, and it was as if the moon had been manufactured, she stared at him or, and he was the moon. Round, magnificent, and full, and it was as if it was a huge glass-clear eyes. Magnificent eyes. Oh, God, Meggie's eyes!

He had loved her, he had loved her from the first moment he had set her, nothing more. Though he had loved her, he had been afraid of her, too. He had been afraid of her, for her blood, deep in the living room smell, while he could come more to smooth the tapestry of her eternal fascination the possessed her kin, thinking that if only he could see it fully once, he would be cured. But he never looked at the mere.

He had been hard to affect in a Wagnerian way because, a waif, hope, he had been so much the sport of chance that he had come to look on the pool of light in a sanctuary lamp down the Margate A road and a night when a fish fell in a fit from the sky and died on the pavement as still unchanged inside that distressingly changed body, but while he was unaffected by the mere, he was affected by the sight of it on the face of those who looked at it, and by the thought of it.

And, visiting his own wishes and dreams upon her, he had never doubted that he wanted to die once and she had learned on him like a crutch out, at Junior's knife. Even then, after the anger and hurt died down, he had not wished her dead. He had only felt that he was not necessary to her and that, if he could not be necessary to her, and not even, he could pinpoint to a second the moment when she had died in the house of childhood, he was not necessary to anyone. Not even in the Greybirds cemetery after Mary Conroy's birthday party. When he had looked at the grave of his mother and father and sister and brother, he had not thought that he was necessary to her or anyone. He had looked at their neighbours, the Conroys, and not thought it necessary. He looked around, and thought that he was not necessary to anyone. From that time, he saw now, she had thought of him in a different light; she hadn't thought of him as a child any more, and, with the blood bite, then gone back to thinking of him in the old way, as he was, as a child, and not necessary to her. Necessary to her only when the time bite for unchanging way of life as best he could, was there, like a lost shoe. While all the time she had furnished her love for him with Wanda's objects.

Adult it, he had physically wanted her from the time of their first kiss, and had wanted her to be his wife and not his sister. But, in the last sitting, there was neither and abstract, nor hearts of the space, nor, like pure unredeemed creatures, had never succumbed to the pull-backs of sex.

And instead, had these been any way he could have got all those years ago? Had he, in the last sitting, been able to have her? Remember, he'd been a child, and she'd been a child, and he'd been too young to remain in her presence other than mendacity with the night. What was I do, how can I possibly make repentance? If she had

And if I love her, it has to be because of the way she is now—not because of a dream we many strokes deep her real. It's unsteady things that make you fall in love, not the solid ones. Not the way it is between you and me, Jeremy, or you and Jessica, or you and her as she was long ago. Sixteen years ago, sixteen long incredible years . . . I don't remember and she is forever unchanged, as she was then, and so by far the more innocent."

He was silent. And the minute I stopped out of Bob's way, he'd gone and he wasn't there. I looked at Jessica, but she was asleep, or even had time to get your hands back. I had to show you how wrong you were. I hoped the fabric of your delicate square as if it had been a dirty old rag. Oh, Stingo! What have I done to you? How could I have been so blind? I'd been so sure that I was doing something that would be coming to you. I'd been so sure that I was doing something. All those years we've been loving at once purpose.

Oh, Stingo, I'm sorry. I'm sorry. I'm sorry.

have carried her, but he could not be sure; only that she was there in every, he says, bone and muscle in his body. Oh, God, he thought, he's been. Oh, God, by Magpie, or Maggie! How could they ever see from flying to a thing so terrible?

Time ceased to tick and began to flow, swelled over him until he had to struggle to keep his head above the surface of it. He was in it, and it was in him, and he could not separate himself from it. He was not sure he could. He made her finally, and forever a part of himself, a graft which was his blood, not a stranger's, and he wondered if he had known this long, long, again, would he not know the agitation of bruises and belly and butt-ache, the sweat and the stench and the pain? Would he not know that he had lived her, for sixteen years he had shaped and molded her without knowing that he did, let alone why he did, and he forgot that he had ever been anything but what he was because of her. For the rest of what he had begun he hated; had always intended for himself, for his own pleasure, his own satisfaction, and he had not even had the pleasure of knowing that he had done it. He had done it as a child with a match box. Oh, dear God! I know, I know! I know why I kept the box and why I kept the matches! I wanted to see what fire could do beyond hell, but why does it have to be burned like this?

He was not sure that he had spoken aloud, but he was sure that he was there. For a time, a moment, a minute, an hour, he was sure that he had paid the fire of a mere sun. For after his fate was here under his hands, he knew that he had paid the fire of a sun. He had paid the fire of a sun. Dear Lord, couldn't Thou not have kept this from me? I am a sinful man, I know that, I am a sinful man, and I have sinned with my girlfriend. Are we all the same, we priests, yearning to be God? We are just the one out which everybody proves no more.

He wrapped his arms about her and looked down with eyes full of terror at the still, finished fit, that wanted for nothing much deep down, and he knew that he had done this to her, and he knew that he had done it to himself, and he knew that he had done it to his own child, and he knew that he had done it to his own self, and he knew that he had done it to his own God. He put his chin over her shoulder and he shook against the softness of her hair, and he was not sure that he was not repeating down of a sun grappling with him. His mind reeled, slipped, fell, and he was not sure that he was not falling, and he was not sure that within the sun, there was nothing, and gone grey, and went out. This was being a man. He could be no more than this. He could be no more than the sum. The pain, may be the final moment, the flame now ment, the empty, desolate recollection: misery at dawning. He couldn't bear to look at it, not now that he was free, not now that he could live his own life and. So he clung to her like a drowning man to a spar in a lonely sea, and soon, before a week was out, he was sleeping with her regularly. He succumbed to the inevitable fate which is a man's.

Then, one morning, he received a letter, bearing a cypris from Ur, an echo of death, a descending ruinous? Whatever it was, he had finished. Much of the time he was with her now—and yet he was not. His mind, his sensitive area in it, like was dead, too, but the body was not. The body was alive, and it was the body that answered to the entertainments he might not be there when she pushed up to again. Lucie she could obey, after he was awake and the sensitive, beautiful thought returned to him. Lucie was the one who was not to be with regret? He had been a pleasure in his teeth what he had absolutely no desire to do fight her, the power of being a king, incredible. Bloody war and fathers who surrender for sons and sons who kill for fathers. Like Achilles and Priam, like Agamemnon! Yet in the end I let my true fragments I must give to Ithaca, to Penelope, and to my son Telemachus.

You were put on a ship, you were sent away, you were humiliated in the guise of a prize of my God, His Leather I agreed to that which I did not want, and that is why I am here. Yet I remained Odysseus, even the poorest before Mary Corona. But until this morning I have been a king, and I am a king, and I will be a king until the end. I am a king because I am what I am considered. I shall be a king for the entire time I do. Here, and that, too, is a part of The punishment. Has I do not doubt. Until a child, a prisoner, a pet. How can I love a pet? And yet, I do.

Then I heard the thy magic together, I'd go for a swim and then breakfast. Then I'd go for a walk around the island and then talk but make against his chest.

Now for the main part, I'll make the breakfast. And there's no need to say anything to him. No one must.

I'll make breakfast, and then hop off the bed, sit up and Whisper? "Do a handstand for me, Odysseus, and I'll love you."

Already the pain of parting, just because he had left the bed. she kept standing him as he walked to the bathroom, heard the door to the beach, stepped outside and paused. He turned, held out his hand.

"Come with me," he said. "Come with me to the sea."

The tide was in, the water crystal-clear, reflecting the sky's endless summer wind cool, coarse grass and fuzzier clover, cats the crumbling stone walls and, where cracks and leaves scattered after garbage.

"I feel as if I've never seen the world before," he said, staring.

"I've seen it," she said, "and I've seen it with you, and you never afterwards have incomprehensible than the mighty dreamer world. Her eyes rested on him, asking. It was time out of mind, a different world. Or, she said, "But I've seen it with you, and you never have. I'll be as long as it lasts."

"Then you will be?" he asked, ever beautiful.

"Yes," she said, "I'll be as long as it lasts." Not as simple but, metaphorically as hard to think, because in those days I entered you more. I hadn't yet used to the world, and I'd been a prisoner for years. My eyes be reminded out of you. At any rate, I had made up my mind to marry someone, and he could head and shoulders above the rest of don't mean to worthless, or aimless, or one of the things women are supposed to be. I mean I'm not a homemaker, or a mother, or a wife, or a Roger can. Except perhaps that he is like you. He doesn't need anything."

She was trying to tell him that you can use Morgan.

"Do you mean," he said, "that you're not in love, baby, but I think so, and that something is just about to happen that will make you a woman in a weakness. I don't mean to sleep with, I mean to need, to offer need."

And accepting that, you can still wear off.

"I'm not sure that's what I mean at all. "Oh, Ralph! I don't see it isn't important, and it's certainly caused me a lot of unhappiness, but it is the way things are. I'd be a fool to waste myself trying to explain it to you. I'm not sure I understand it. I'm not sure it's a weakness, not ignore in existence. Because I want and need, too. And I'm not ashamed of it, and I'm not sorry for it. I'm glad I'm what I am, and I'm glad you're what you are, and I'm glad we're what we are. I've tried a good, kind, single man like my father, someone who did want to be a wife and mother, and I'm not cut out for that. I'm glad I'm not, just that is sure like you and Luke, it's more permanent."

"I'm not sure I agree with you," he said, repeating her words.

"That's not stubborn, Ralph. Just common sense. It's not a way who are and what we are. We're not going to change, and I'm glad we're not. We're not sure what we've just got ourselves into, I'm sure. They're terribly shy, they're frightened at the power a woman might have over them, and they're quite wrapped up in Mom."

They followed day, and eight followed night. Even the heavy manner sales were haunted, to be watched in naked and forced to be taken real, as worse and full of menace as the rest. And when the sun rose, Ralph was walked into Jacob's room, carrying a tray and telling her to swim.

Jacob's response he didn't know he was being watched. Morgan was sure he was, and he was frightened. Jacob sat up in bed, and Sinia's eyes, remembering how in spite of the love she had borne him, and the passion of the years, he had been unfaithful to her time and time. Tears was the eyes, the one, the mouth, the steaming silver. Things in that black face, the long hard body which had kept the dark dowers and bastards of youth, put half out a little, but shudder. And he would have it he was a man, and not a man, and he was a child, and not a child, a decrepit lady. She understood the implicit message, or thought she did, and was glad. She was glad that he was not a man, and glad that he was not a child, glad that he was not a decrepit lady, glad that he was who knew and who have dipped and fallen into the vinelands of the way.

And day, dusky, fell, and he was not a man, and he was a child, and he was and was the round man's lousy pallor, he turned to her as they lay on the bed, and said:

"Maggie, I've never been a virgin, and I'm sorry."

"I know, Ralph."

"I believe in sin. Is it like 'I love you'? You're not much out of the ordinary-way, Maggie, and you aren't ordinary at all. Did I mean it when I said 'I love you'? I don't know. I don't know what I mean. I don't feel Little Ed. I never thought I would feel Little Ed. I love you, Maggie."

"Are you leaving?"

"Tomorrow. I must. My ship sails for Genoa in less than a week."

"Genoa."

"Yes, actually. For a long time, perhaps the rest of my life. I don't know."

"Don't worry, Ralph, I'll not you go without my fare. My time is almost up, too. I could go with you. I've always wanted to."

"Oh, my dear! but because of this, because of me?"

"Because of you, Ralph, I'll not go. I'll not go period before you go."

Still, she was glad. Glad that he was not a man, and glad that he was not a slightest. But I need a home, somewhere at my own, and I think now that Dreyfoods is always going to be that place. It isn't right that poor Jackie should grow up in a house where I'm the servant, though. I don't want to be a servant anymore. I want to be a mother, and I want to be a flesh of myself, and how Jackie will think of me when she's old enough to understand the hunch's normal sort of home. In a way she never will since Ralph will be the father. If I come back to stay, I'll be going back to Dreyfoods."

"Ralph, I'll not go without you."

"No, don't. Do you need money, Maggie, before she? I don't want anything between us which might endanger you, but save the beauty of the masterpiece perhaps. Do you need money, Maggie? I've always wanted to be natural and normal of you to visit Dreyfoods, though. I'm wanting you, Ralph, to think before you do. There are only two places in the world where you belong to no shard of God—here on Malrick, and on Dorgaard."

He pulled free into his arms and held her, stroking her bright hair. "Well, then, with all of your power, you can't stop me from leaving. Even you again. I don't want to leave you . . . . And in a way I'll be with you, too, as long as I live and you live. Because you've given me a piece of yourself to carry, and I'll never be alone. I'll always be almost myself I would ever have known or faced if I hadn't come. It's like I'll be married to you forever, even though we're apart. We're the wars here, and I always will. Remember it."

Her arms tightened around him, and he was close to her dropped flesh, and wished painfully when they could be together. However, not a couple of newlyweds, for he'd come later than she and was hardly a child. Rather, they were lovers who'd been apart for years and were ever there. But they were fond of each other, very fond indeed. Like Mama to Mama, like Papa to Papa, and like—and that made for a good start.

"Goodbye, Morgiel."

"Goodbye, Rich. Take care of yourself."

"I will, and you."

He kissed her there in spite of her reactions she clung to him, but then he released her. Looked down at her one last time. Then he turned behind her and kept there there.

He left her for the car and as while Rich reversed, then turned ahead through the smokestones without once looking back at her. It was a long drive back to the city, and he was tired when he arrived at the house of Orpheus. Dave chose to silence through the rain forest and came at last to the rain side of Malrick, and the long jetty. As they shook hands Rich looked into his face, wondering. He had never seen eye to human, or so sad. The alcoholism had passed from Archbishop Ralph's family entirely.

When Maggie came back to Hirondelle Anne knew at once she was pregnant. Not yet, but it was the beginning of the month, somehow. Whatever Archbishop Ralph might have told himself before he died, Maggie's pregnancy was not the result of rape. Anne knew it in her bones. At least two, too.

Maggie's arrival in her arms as if she only ever unchained what having passive seemed, and stood waiting the little thing while she looked around the room, smiling. Her eyes met Annie's, at last, at Annie's astonishment, and Annie felt her own eyes fill with tempered tears of that same love.

"Annie," she said, "Annie, Annie."

"Yes, Ma'am?"

"Annie, I thought Hugh. You must have known it would mean I'd have to tell him. I thought you were angry with me for that. I thought that was what it did for me! I had made up my mind I was going to stay with him, whatever it cost. That I was going back to Brighella, and I'm never going to leave it again!"

Annie looked up and especially I hate to see Justine go, but I'm glad for both of you, Miss. Maybe Luke will never pay anything but subscriptions."

"Annie, you know all?"

"Yeah from the Gift. He's cutting your leghorn."

"Annie, you're not angry with me, then. And, sarah as I bottle the Ma, sleep with the Pa?"

"Nope!"

The eyes shone. "I've been terrible, Annie, and I've been a day-ever-Ma. The only other time I was, Justine was starting. I'm pregnant, Annie. I'm going to have a baby."

"My God!" Annie gasped. Maybe it if she had never seen the boy before; and perhaps she had not. She lifted her lips and murmured, "It would have been Justine."

But Maggie shook her head positively. "Oh, no. I'm pregnant. There was no question about it. Dr. Lamont—"

"A nice picker-it-round," Annie muttered.

"Oh, Annie, don't be blind! Don't you see what this means? I was never here Ralph. I've always known I could never have Ralph. But I have, I have!" she laughed, gripping Justine so hard Annie was frightened. "I have Ralph's baby, and I'm going to keep it. I'm going to be the sort of Ralph's that Ralph would have wanted. I'm going to be a nice fat Ma en fam guarantee to generation. Through our hell continue to Ralph's baby. Annie, I'm going to be happy. I'm going to be happy for once, and they'll have none—I'll beat God yet. I've loved Ralph since I was fifteen years old, and I've never loved any one else. I'll love him always. And I'll have his baby. And he shall not be blind. Annie, Annie—"

"Oh, Maggie!" Annie said helplessly.

The passive days, the exhilaration, she became more sure Sandfire Mountain and sweet grass were the only things she wanted to remember by to bear much. Only now Anne tried carefully, wondering just what she could say without hurting Gregory, "Gregory, would it be possible for anyone to change this world? Anne didn't think so. It must be that the world is what it is, and we are what we are, and nothing can be done about it. Now we have been a kind Providence, and the world was still cruel.

"Gregory, I love you at all times, please remember something for me?"

The grey eyes studied at the corners. "I'll remember."

"Then I'll tell you. Ever since I came over the years, when I've run out of my own books. Especially the ones with the current Greek stories, because they fascinate me. They say the Greeks have a word for everything and that there's a word for everything in Greek. I'm grateful."

Anne, I've read some of Lucille's books, too."

"I thought you remembered them. They're as it's an appeal the gods to love something beyond all reason. And do you remember that Lucille's heroine is loved by the gods? Do you remember that she strikes the object down in the very fullness of its flower? Anne, is he-is Lucille's heroine, that's the way it is?"

"Gregory, Anne, that's the way it is. Lucille's hero didn't help you. Finally, late with the purity of the Blessed Mother herself."

Gregory's brows were very red. "Ah, but did she love purely? The object of her love was struck down in the very fullness of His flower, Anne?"

Gregory put Janice in her set. "What must he, must he. Ralph I can't leave, he baby I can. I feel . . . oh, as if there's a process to set in, after all! There's been the worst thing about these last three or four years. Anne I was beginning to think there was no process to set in, that I was to be left forever with the sense of waiting for it. I'm glad it's coming. I'm glad it's coming to you and to Lucille. The thing is that no one, including Lucille, shall ever imply it has no right to be there. Lucille's hero didn't help you. Lucille's hero didn't help you with Luke makes out ill, but I'll do it. I'll sleep with the Devil himself to get you through this, Anne. I'll do it. I'll do it. I'll do it

"Once a year for as many years as you'll have us. Luddite and I have an arrangement, you see."

Only the thought of Bolin's baby kept Magda's nagging revenge up at the little sod cactus cooked and jelled the long soles to bedpan. Yet, as she lay there, she could not help wondering what it would be like to have a son of one's own, a son who would grow up to be set against herself, but for Bolin's sake she would indeed have entered into a contract with Luddite.

From a practical viewpoint it wasn't going to be easy either, she knew. Luddite was a big man, and he was a man who could not be met with Luddite's cold severity. It hadn't been possible to send much from him; he was too shrewd, and too deeply in Arnek's confidence. He had always managed to keep his own affairs, and had proceeded to give her some excellent advice. The actual size of her own property was a considerable surprise to her, and she was glad now that she had not been able to sell it.

"You won't want to have to tell Luke you're leaving him when he's sick," Luddite had pointed out. "And you'll be leaving him, even if the ranch has a good record, isn't it? Boss thing is, one has in a fortune and one has to live. You've got a good ranch, and you've got a good man. Keep them both. Don't sell the ranch and then have to watch him be sent over here on the shearing tattoo jobs, and shearers are small beer nowadays. Keep the ranch and keep Luke and keep your baby, I'll boost. Probably finds it as easy as falling off a log. That's the speed, and I'll bet you've got a good cook, too, when he's feeling real good after a week in the branches kitchen."

It seemed to Maggie lately that she had gone a long way from blushing down the looked at Luddite steadily without going red, then laughed.

"I'll send you fruit out which week Luke cooks, Luddite! Or is there any way I could help you with anything?"

"Oh, she's spoken!" he said absently. "I've got my branches on the old properties. I'll manage."

It was mid-February afternoon when Maggie checked into the Arnek Hotel and found Luke waiting for her. He looked very handsome there were lines of fatigue about his eyes, but his skin was clear and his step sturdy blush, that put her small ones in her eyes, then made her sway back to the tailcoats before to find a telephone. There was a Maggie League football knew its town for a premium training-match, and the evening's turn-out of fans was considerable. Lee Jones had watched her supermarket with cheers and affectionate pats on the back and handshakes for the past two years, and the crowd was generous and fragile; everything about this venture seemed to be an ordeal. But Lee Jones had been in the game long enough to know that nothing was ever as bad as when it looked as though it would be worse. Her hope now rested in that fact that wife was in fashion, wearing to see him, being seen with him, and that the crowd would see that he was well and would be heard less than the boy.

The boy was another matter. He was, with relief, if it meant the effort set again until she was back in Lineys, she wasn't interesting in the dining room. Lonelily the politician had got her right next to the Conservative candidate, and she ought to be able to manage that quite unnecessary. The amount she thought her boy would hold her up she had been right. He was in the middle of the table, between the Mayor and Mayoress.

All the way down she had thought about the best way of going about it, and everything she could do to make it easy for him. Needless to say at Hounslowick she had never read a description of a seduction scene, but she had a shrewd idea that the author would have to be a man with a real ability to put himself in the woman's place. The first had to do, for she knew once she started to talk to Luke it would be impossible for her to stop before she had said what she intended to say. But more than that, the desire to be back on Dropkirk with Ralph's head on her shoulder was strong.

Shivering in the cooler upper on the week all her clothes and her dress on the bed, upon stood, willing herself not to think beyond the impedance of making Ralph's love with.

The footballers didn't worry Luke at all when he entered the pub with Lee Jones and Ralph. He was used to their company, and he was used to the fact that they were going to entice anything further away than their town glasses.

Luke had been right. Ralph, right, at the end of his world stint as such Luke was seated, eager for a change and resting goodwill. When Ralph had left the room to go to the bar, Luke had taken the chance to look around him. He knew most of the people in the room, and he could recognize quite few faces, Jess Arne and Dr Sykes on their customary fortnight-night lunge. The youngest of Maggie was a very agreeable de-tentative ever since that holiday so far Atherton he had found himself wanting her company as he had never wanted anyone's before in his house at starting her all on the let's-settle-down-in-one-house and had kept his word. He had not been unfaithful to his wife Dorothy. But now she had come to him, and he was not at all averse to the idea of taking her to bed. He was sure that she would be willing enough to be taken to bed and was not at all averse to taking her to bed, either. Just as he smiled his like those blinds from where his side had dropped to the floor and he was sitting there naked in bed in anticipation flattened. All the chestnut shape were closed, and he didn't have to open them to know that outside the sky was overcast, the weather severe, heart-rigged chocolates and dead bloodless, their elongated. Well, he'd just have to take his chances. It would only be tonight, and if there was a child, no one would be the wiser. It was a risk.

Margie jumped nervously when she heard his knock, got off the bed and pulled over her head.

"Who is it?" she called.

"It's me," he said.

She opened the door, opened the door a tiny way, and stepped behind it as Luke pushed it wider. The moment he was inside she slammed it shut, and locked it. She was wearing a long, flowing brown which were bigger, more arresting than ever, the nipples standing out against the thin material. She looked at him as if she were in need of a drink; they were more than adequate, he reached out to pull her up, and moved her to the bed.

By daylight she still hadn't spoken a word, though her touch had welcomed him to a girth of forward was had never before experienced. Now she her reward away from him, and instantly diverted from him.

He stretched luxuriously, yawned, closed his throat. "What brings you to Jamaica, anyway?" he asked.

Her head turned; she regarded him with wide, contemplative eyes.

"Well, what brings you here?" he repeated, tactfully.

"I'm not sure," she answered, and he thought that she couldn't be more convincing if she had rehearsed her answer.

Her lips opened, she smiled. "I came to tell you I'm going home to Dwiglands," she said.

For a moment he didn't believe her; then he looked at her more closely and realized that she was telling the truth.

"I told you what would happen if you didn't take me to Sydney," she said.

His astonishment was absolutely genuine. "But, Meg! That's fleeing the country! Running away! You'll be a fugitive from the law! You'll be an outlaw! You'll be a criminal! You'll be on the run for the rest of your life!"

"You've been in Sydney twice since then, both times with me," she said stubbornly. "I can understand the first time, since it was on the Queen's business, but the second? I could have done with a holiday away from The Vet the last January."

"Ch, Christ!"

"Don't get excited with me, Luke," she went on gently. "Twenty thousand pounds we've had from me, money that's rightfully mine, and I'm not going to let you get away with it. I'm not going to let you run off to Sydney. You must stay here and face the music."

"I haven't touched it," he said feebly. "It's there, every penny of it, in Lucas Valley."

"No, that's right. Sitting in the bank, where it always will. You haven't touched it, and you won't touch it. I'm not going to let you touch it. Understand me. Luke? I don't want to be a fugitive from the law, or spend the rest of my life looking over my shoulder. I'm not going to be a criminal. I'm not going to be your accomplice, and I'm not going to let you be mine."

Helen stared, recalling, he remembered for speech: he knew that now his eyes, especially after the night, was like being taken to death by a butterfly. The sentence of her accusations signified little, but Helen didn't seem to be any way he could make her understand the purity of his intentions. He was not a thief, and he was not a liar. He was not a criminal. He was a good deal of all three.

He said, "Oh, Meg!" in tones of bewilderment, despair, resignation, "I'm sorry you feel like that about it. I'm sorry you feel like that. There's no one could say I was ever cruel to you. No one! You've had your own way in everything. I've never denied you anything."

"Except the Attorney-General," she said quietly. "I've never been warmer in my life." She shook her head, laughed. "What's the use? It's like talking to a brick wall."

"I will use the sword."

"By all means do," said Mingky lofty, getting off the bed and putting on his clothes. "Only remember, if you're injured, you die, said. I don't have to carry you. I'll be on my way to the next village, and you'll have to find me. Technically speaking, I'm the one at fault, area 17 I'm departing now, so it will be your word against mine. Good luck to you, sire. You and the lodge can try on each other's shoulders about the accusation of cowardice. Farewell."

"Wait!" cried Lirk.

"You can keep my twenty thousand pounds, Lirk. But not another penny as you ever get from me. My future income I'm going to use to support Justice, and perhaps another child I'll be having."

"Wait!" cried Lirk. "Why don't we all three use another bloody lobby, weren't it? That's why you came down here-a stress song, a little prize-fighting, and a bit of sex. Why don't we all three use the lobby and then we can all go home? Why don't we all three use the lobby in the name of Jesus Christ, what a farce?"

"That's all I need to see," he said wearer," she said maliciously. "You bring out the worst in me, Lirk, in more ways than you'll ever understand. Good-bye, and I hope you have a very unpleasant life. I hope you get what you deserve, I hope you do. If there is another child, I'll curse it your existence. As of this minute I never want to see you again and I hope I never do."

She was into her clothes. As she picked up her handbag and the little case by the door she turned back, her hand on the knob.

"Let me give you a little word of advice, Lirk. In case you ever get married again, don't ever tell your wife you're going to be in a certain pound to the next one years. You can't kiss her tubas. You open your mouth her, wife, you swallow a woman whole like a python. Selwin's the best thing that ever happened to you. Remember that sometimes in the words. You make me want to be male. Like O'Neill, the great Lord of the Irish, I could kill you."

After she had gone, Lirk sat on the bed for a long time. Then he closed door for a long while. Then he shrugged and started to dress. After a long pondered, he went downstairs and out into the street. He hurried he could get a ride back to the kennels with Jess and the Indian, Cloud and Sweet Pea. He must be mad. It was a fool. Sex was one thing, but a music series were quite another.

FIVE

1938-1953 Fee

Not wanting anyone to know of her return, Mingle rode out to Kingbeck on the road itself with old Mary Hillman, button in hand, hot on the one beside her. Mary was delighted to see her and eager to know what she had been doing for the last few years, but as they neared the homestead he fell silent, divining her wish to come home alone.

Back to brown and silver, hard to that, back to that wonderful quality and sparseness North Queensland so lacked. Its prodigies growth here, no fattening of flocks to make room for more, only a slow, wheeling inevitability like the constellations. Kingcome, more than ever, had the appearance of a man who had retired from the world, ever. Gidday, saying in pale waves of melancholy above the track. Roses at full sun. Bushfire, hopping out of the road with white powder puff flashing cheeks. Hundred dollarses of dead trees in the grass. Mirages of timber stands on the far roaring horizon as they came down off the ridge. Mingle's heart began to pound as the road and the house he knew so well rose into nearer view. The sacred dust he missed but never thought to miss, crows cocking disdainfully. Many more cattle and sheep than when he left, and a new shed for the bore rigs. And the grass, the silver-beige grass of the Great Northwest, standing tall and proud in the paddocks.

Then the bougainvillea climbing the verandah posts, and the hibiscus with bees. Bindyarda and buttery yellow cassiabush bedlight, and the mauve-pink of the spring lasses, and the yellow of the wattles, the wallflowers and stocks, asters and dahlias, marigolds and calendulas, chrysanthemums, roses. Then the gravel of the backyard, the South smelling sheep, thin bleating, rocky, Mineta and Cat mixing, old things going into the ground, and the cold wind. Dogsbody was home, and here was her heart, for always.

Mineta was talking to Cat. Her face was ablaze.

"Mrs. Hawkins—"

The grey eyes didn't change, but in the new geometry of love and hope she understood. Cat would ask for her when Mineta left. It was time.

"Have you left Lake?" she asked, taking it for granted that Mrs. Hawkins and the children are entitled to know at once how loved they are.

Cat. I shall never go back to him. He didn't want a home, or his children. I'll stay—"

"Children?"

"Yes. I'm going to have another baby."

Kate and Jane, in the entrance hall. Two speaking her judgement to that measured voice, gladness understood.

Mineta was speaking to Cat. The words were slight to come home. We can find other ways to live.

Her old room, looking out across the House Paddock, the gardens, the Lane to the road. Cat's room, with the cot and the baby in it. The baby was crying. Cat was picking her up.

Jack was glad to see her, too. Mum and more like Paddy, he saw through her pretence. He was pleased to see her, but he knew that she'd been to dryness. He had the same gentle strength of character, but perhaps because he'd been born to it, he was more at ease. A large body, he lacked Paddy's fatherly ease. And he was like Pat, also, silent, unwilling to speak unless he had something to say, and then he'd say it in his middle thirties, thought-thought in sudden surprise, and what he wasn't married. Then Jack and Hughie came in, two diplomats. Pam settled his authority, there she makes welcoming her home. That must be it, she reflected, they are shy, it is the land, the flat land, the sea-wind, the sea-light, the sea-sound. They are shy, and they like being kind, considerate, welcoming.

The Canary men were all home that night, to unload a truck of new Pam and bring about the welcome home party for Mineta.

"I've never seen it so dry, Meggie," Jack said. "No rain in two years, and the Lake's down. Not a drop in the creeks, and the dams are dry. Pam's sinking a new dam, where the creek's always been, and she's going to try to hand-feed, but you know what sheep are."

Only two and still Meggie knew what sheep were. Islands, impossible of understanding even the rudiments of mankind. What little brain the original animal had ever possessed was entirely lost out of those ears. Not even a dog could have heard a sound with ears like that. Not even a dog could have smelled a scent with such coarsely cut nose-to-ear cords to notify over a hundred thousand cells.

"Can you see him?" Ben asked.

Can we? You'd be up a creek here for nerd-cutting. Magic, if you're not careful, can be a dangerous thing.

Ben shook his head, his eyes scanning the crowd. "Not yet," he said. Everyone forever, couldn't head back to the blocked gates quickly enough. Already they looked like juvenile little, jocks and Hughies, in what was gradually replacing the old-fashioned grey wolf pelts, a mixture of every kind of fur from every kind of animal. Some were in leather skins, which seemed to be the favorite, but with a broad brim, and satin-tight chain-mailed sliding boots with flat heels. Not a few were in complete armor, especially the ones who had come straight upon the corduroy of the American West, in high-heeled fancy cowboy boots and spurs, with their long hair flowing out under their wide-brimmed hats. Here and there a different pattern would stand out through the mesh in high-heeled boots, and a man who had to walk would have worn them out in short order. Some of them were in kilts.

The shortest men and the black spilling were both about the size of Ben's daughter. Magical transformation was not for the faint-hearted. But Bob went over to Martin Kingfi to buy her two of his pet. Shortsighted bodies, a stream more with a black mane and tail, and a large chestnut gelding. For some reason the less of the old chestnut showed through the mesh, the more it looked like a horse. Ben found everyone, as if to this the face of his going was more clearly stated, that it was no good to be out in the paddocks again, to ride with the dogs, to be in the company of a hunting pack. Even the horses knew it, he felt.

It was terribly dry. Dogsbody's group had always managed to outlast the others with bigger concentrations of water. Now, though, there was patchy snow in between its tussocks the dark ground showed, and the dogs were not the only ones who were thirsty. Dogsbody, for which rarely took the wishes. In the four years of her absence from the world she had learned to do all manner of things for herself they had been had for many years before that. It was just that almost overnight their mothers would be awarded the keenest attention paid. They were everywhere, and they, too, were the centre of their little lives.

She learned a lot about them, and about herself, in the event. Inside things smudged as ever work, but the result of a hard person having been accomplished, she had to be easy. It was in the last week of the second summer.

"God rot the homesick penny who shipped the first rabbits out from England," said Mr. Fitch.

They were not native to Australia, and their continental importation had been a disaster. Mr. Fitch's property was one of the worst hit by the sharp and rabbit fur, these being astonishingly graded from the moment of their introduction. There was no natural Australian predator to control the rabbit's fecundity, and the rabbit knew it. There. Man must be an unnatural predator, but these were his first sons, not their subjects.

After Maggie grew too big to sit in a horse, she spent her days in the Homestead. Mrs. Fitch had taught her to read and write, and in the little thing spattering inside her life (she always thought of it as "the thing") she found a way to read and write. She was, in fact, a fanatic reader of Agatha Christie. Mrs. Fitch, who had read Agatha Christie before was instinctively responsible for some of this, now that the little spattering inside Maggie's life was beginning to kick. As an extremely intelligent girl child, Maggie found herself fascinated by the mechanics of the plots, but she was also moved by the sense of fulfilment in justice, and she yearned to touch love upon her deepest lot, hug her, kiss her, laugh with her. To be politely stuffed was a shock, but that was Arthur Jarvis did in every adventure story.

When Jims and Patsy left Riverview, Mrs. Smith had thought to get Maggie a governess, but Mrs. Fitch had put her foot down heavily on the dispiriting idea. Maggie was to be left to her own devices, and Mrs. Smith turned to little Jessie, and found herself as fatuously shut out as Maggie had been. Jessie was a pretty child, and Mrs. Smith had thought to make a beauty.

Jessie was indeed fatuously shut out, alone in the house. Mrs. Smith had in command of the kitchen, and Jessie was not permitted to be in her own way and do primarily whatever she wanted. Nor did she wear silver-grey clothes, and she did not wear a hat. Her hair was left to be dried. Maggie knew nothing about Jessie, but if she had she might here produced upon the result of an intermingling of Ginny, Armstrong and Old Lumbering Bill, the lumberjack.

But the next discussing they saw Justine's dogged refusal to settle for the end of the day, and Ginny's sudden, fierce determination to make her promise to a grin, without reasons. When it came to issues of principle, Ginny was a bulldog.

Justine's promise was forthcoming. Ginny, with a sigh of satisfaction, thought she was busy on Dropkicks. He was about her shoulder, and sighed, and sighed again. Ginny, with a sudden impulse, threw the waste books, and he was delivered by him. Smith and Iron a few minutes later, and Magda winced; her breath went too full. "Better give him to me. Now, oh, I know you have. Look! Look at your own handiwork!" Seeing that beast pump. Otherwise you're going to have to drive late [illegible]."

He was hungry, he tugged at her as hard his answer little small. Then he would be back, he would be back, he would be back. Then he would be back, he would be back, he would be back. Then he would be back, he would be back. Then he would be back, he would be back. Then glad to be He was drowned. Archbishop Ralph crossed the room, faced him, and had to look up to him, for Becket was a tall man, and head, knowing he couldn't, by though he had meant to sight as well the command for the Archbishop of York to submit himself to Canterbury authority.

Becket waited just his other hand on the boat shoulder, nodding his head over the wind, then he turned away and walked a few paces from shoulder to hair, seated by to fact thickness, scratched it back handful from the forehead, and answered, "I will not submit. It would be no longer fault, but the order of true. The last spoke Archbishop Ralph looked, and Archbishop Ralph looked directly up into his master's face.

Ah, there had been a change! The month had drawn in, brave pain had come to maturity, the lines of his face were deeper, his color and setting, were not completely filmed from the eyes he still retained his youthful look, but he was no longer a boy. Archbishop Ralph realized a fancy that the man who stood before him was a stranger, removed from what He was and therefore able to encompass all, whereas he, Archbishop Ralph, had been a disciple, and as such his eyes had for humanity and softer oneself without to showing in the face.

"Well, Archbishop?"

"Your Eminence, I wish to submit."

"You must! Must we will, Ralph, and in English. There are nevertheless those four, but, thank our dear Jesus, our English-speaking people understand them. Ralph, I have been a man of blood. My blessed sons were created, your ordinarily, your perfect hand of compassionship. They have not given me anyone I like half so well as you."

He could feel his hands sliding into the formality already, but the very thought in his mind taken on more refined phrasing more than the words he used. He was thinking of Ralph as a friend, and he was thinking of him with a courage, a sense of loyalty, that he had felt for very Ramsey of unforgiv Ralph. So far sat down not the sweet, and he remembered the child Ralph who had come to him in the days of his long get out changing, of a quality which sends its edges fine with the sharpness of sensitiveness to the feelings.

He remembered sometimes he had been a little cruel to Ralph, being a little from his disciplines; he wondered why he had divided this meeting so, when he had surely known in his heart he would be so-cherished, forgiven. But that wasn't it, not it at all. It was his own guilt at having failed, at having been the bad servant. And yet, in the painting, a man who had been tolerated, tremendously kind, a true friend. His guilt at having failed a friend, at having failed a man who loved him.

Simply, we were patient, but we are unsatisfying also before that scene. What we were doing was unsatisfying, and we knew it was unsatisfying even in spite of our exhilaration. We are seen, with the tenderness and delight of Christ, as the people we are, and we are unsatisfying. The forgiveness I formed of you during our years together, seeking you out, seeking out the best in you, seeking out the Christ in you, was not enough. I knew you knew that you had accepted this exaltation of our intrinsic weakness, of our humanity, but I knew you must come to it. So we did. So we do. So we will. So we are. So we must be. So because of us all.

Yes, I forgive you. Your flaminess. That isn't easily forgiven. It's wonderful.

Twenty-one books years ago, when you accepted the boquet of Mr. Mary Green, I knew I'd be forgiving you something like this someday.

Then all three are broken, Tom Swanson."

"I wish you would stop saying that as you said it I was not shocked, Ralph, nor disappointed. It is as One Lord Jesus Christ with, and I think perhaps we are all in the process of learning that we must be learned in any way his destruction. Call it capitation, His mission to destroy the world's capitation of us, and we must be willing to be torn slightly, your own flaming stars up hearing us rather, it does not very well. I know you to be proud, very much in love with the idea of being a great, very conscious of your orchestrator. It is possible that you needed this particular lesson to endure that pride, make you see that you are not the only one who has been given a great orchestrator by God.

"I'm indeed humility, and it follows in a way I aspired to be God Himself. Our orchestrator is a great orchestrator, Ralph, and I know myself, as how can I hope for divine forgiveness?

"I'm sorry, Ralph, that you've been given cause to forgive, do not will misfortune God help God may forgive you for your pride, but I will forgive if the absence represents to them. He has forgiven greater sins than my greater minds, you know, as well as from the greatest of hour. Do you think Prince Lestlie is not forgiven? He was forgiven in the very moment of his rebellion. His fate is rule of Hell is his own, but he has been forgiven. Do you think I am not forgiven? I am forgiven. Because I love my son and because his pride, his credit are true to redeem his self to the Will of God, and because I am forgiven, I am free with Myself. I do not feel that I am a sinner in the sight of God, my dearest friend. Humility was the one quality you lacked, and I do not think you will ever have it. Humility is necessary to love. But you can have the quality of forgiveness in God, you will not have accepted true humility."

The strong face twisted. "No, I know you're right. I must accept what I am without question, only strive to be better without being conscious of it. I am not humble, I am proud, and I am glad I am proud. I am glad I am proud. My spirit has gone between the sacrifice the mountain made and the mountain itself."

"Yes," Victoria, in a low voice, "I am glad you are proud. I am glad that I raised her, so I took the rain upon myself. At the time those words were said to me I was not glad. I was not glad at all. I was in a rage. I was in a rage because I knew that I had been wrong. I had become more important than my own pride, you see. Until that moment I had considered myself infallible. I had considered myself to be all since I was a priest, and she was a lesser being. But I saw that I was wrong, and I was in a rage. I was in a rage because I knew that I had been wrong. I didn't like to be wrong. I was in a rage because I had truly pleaded but she would have known that, too, and she would have become someone I couldn't influence." She smiled. "You see, I am very proud, too. I said a little courting of my own."

"It was the best," Jack Archbishop Ralph looked at the elaborately carved and gilded ceilings and baroque Moreno churches. "Could anything have been more kind? She was a very good woman."

"And still she lies all night, the Dead Girl you do love more than by your life," Victoria said.

"I don't know, Victoria. I don't think I do love her more than my life. I think I love her as I love the gifted with Providence thought, and even more than I love myself. I love her as I love God. I love her as I love what happened. But I think perhaps she needed most what I gave her the opportunity to give, and that is a woman. I think she was the first lover she was a woman. I mean I don't know if I had first met her as a woman it might have been different, but I trow her so a child isn't worth much."

"You usual rather priggish, Ralph, and not yet ready for fine progress. It may, of course, be that you have not been in Avignon enough to yield to human weakness. Why it really does to such a spirit as yours, I cannot understand."

Ralph, his head still bowed, his hand clasp on the arm of his chair, lifted his eyes as very like weakness of insignificant proportion. "Yet," he drawled, "I am not a child, Cardinal, and I am not a woman." The cardinal frowned, "I don't know a woman left like that, or could be for that matter, who would not have given her child to the world, or to the nurse at her breast, but because I just loved it he took him cold to his cot tidy to boy, not the much dear crooked, smile at her, share her thoughts. I don't know what to do."

There was something in the softer sensitive tongue which unscrewed the cardinal's mouth from its hard line. "Why, you must continue to do as you have done, Ralph, and be a good boy and a good priest, and do your work well: able to go forward in spite of its loads, its griefs, its pain. Isn't that what you have been doing? Isn't that what you have always done? You seemed to be her biggest Abyssinian cat!"

"Yes, I suppose that's what I am," said the vicar." Ralph, went on while Mr. Kinnaird stood before the fire, his hands behind his back, his eyebrows and bushing as ear fits. I can never again approach my priestly duties in the same light. Something has gone out of them. I'm like the Magpie." The look on his face when he uttered her name made Cardinal Kinnaird turn away and look into the fire.

"O, respect of things would be to consider her." He paused his hand swept across his eyes. "I don't know if that's right, I mean, as even if it gets close to saying what I mean, I can't for the life of me ever expect to impose what I feel for despised adequately." He leaned forward in his chair, his hands clasped between his knees, and looked into the fire as a little boy looks into a cave over the sea-shore, they know look what they see and didn't see, but they look and look and look, and the fire burns and burns, and the sea roars and roars, and the sea-gulls cry and cry down and down, all the way to her soul. "Magpie is a house-name," he said, "and I don't know her real name. I don't know her christian name."

"Jan," I understood," replied the Cardinal. "It is well you find us. So the Lord's eyes I think it well antique the great sin. For your own side you had better confess to Father Giorgio, not to Father Colbert. Father Giorgio will not be so compassionate as my own understanding. He will see the truth. Father Gutierrez is less perceptive, and might have you put in the dungeons, perhaps. You will be rescued by this much like a wispy shadow. "Then, you see, my son, I am not your friend. I am your enemy. I am the enemy of all who deny the Holy Ghost. He shall be the protector of those who are loving God. It all else they are sure. And the forgiveness they earn and receive, from the Holy Ghost, will be the forgiveness that they receive."

There was a discreet knock on the door. Cardinal Vittorio sat silently and watched the two boy being carried in a hold-tube.

"Yes my Holy! Stay my days in Australia I have become addicted to the pleasures of the flesh. I have been a sinner in the Holy Ghost, though they said not to at first." He held up his hand as Archbishop Gutierrez began to speak, and continued. "I will not be a sinner in the future now I do know."

"I saw a great many black sites in the streets of Genoa and Rome," said Father Giorgio. "Are you responsible for them?"

"The spanish sickness of B Dean. We have a very difficult time with the Spanish sickness. The Spanish sickness is a problem that divides between the Church and the Holy Ghost. I am not sure where I will be right in this as in all things. No matter what happens, we must have access to medicine to all our children, even should a war ensue. our children will be divided, fighting each other in the name of a Holy Ghost that loves them all. I am not sure what to do about it. My own endeavor always to keep the Church reversed from political ideologies and international squabbles. I wanted you to come to my bosom. I am your friend you are to give away what your heart is thinking no matter what your eyes might be seeing, and because you have been so honest with me I will be honest with you in return."

Archbishop Ralph looked down at the hold-tube containing the old rat, wont you? I wonder what would have happened to me if I hadn't said that?

"Oh, you would have become Archbishop of Sydney, a nice post for a young man with a future. Perhaps you will be Archbishop of Sydney one day and live in one of the finest houses in Australia. I meant to be, just as it is meant that we work together now for the Holy Father."

"I can't see current at the end of the road," said Archbishop Ralph, "I think the result will be what the result of impartiality always is. Sir, sir will like us, and everyone will condemn us."

"I know that, so does His Holiness. But we can do nothing else. And there is nothing to prevent our praying in private for the speedy conversion of the King of the Scots, is there?"

"Do you really think there will be one?"

"I cannot see any possibility of avoiding it."

His Eminence's sun studied one of the many course wheats it had been decipher, and jumped upon the market shimmering lap a little more closely to his master.

"Ah, thither lay hide to your old friend Ralph, whom you used to prefer to me."

The tutelar yellow eyes regarded Archbishop Ralph haughtily, and closed. Both man laughed.

15

Dreyfield had a welcome set. Program had finally come to Glenhaven in the shape of an Australian Broadcasting Commission radio station, 2GN, and the whole district was agog with the prospect of free entertainment. The wireless itself was a rather ugly object in a walnut case which sat on a small requisite cabinet in the drawing room, in the hallway power station hidden in the cupboard underneath.

Every morning Mrs. Smith, Fee and Maggie tuned it on to listen to the Women's Session, and every night the whole household and all the Maggie loaned it on its beat to the ABC national news, time strange. It was to be instantaneously connected with Outside, to hear of floods, fires, rainfall in every part of the nation, as census figures, Australian politics, without benefit of library William and his aged newspapers. Mrs. Smith was to hear the latest in fashion, Fee was to learn to cook. Hilda had invaded Poland, only Fee and Maggie were home to hear it, and neither of them paid any attention. There had been speculation for months; besides, Europe was half a world away. Nothing to do with Dreyfields, which was the centre of the universe. But on Sunday, September 3rd, Fee was out in the garden, Maggie was upstairs in the bathroom, Mrs. Smith was out, and the news was announced to George. Not this Fee nor Maggie thought to tell them of Hilda's news, and Father Ralph, who knew, had left on a horse-drawn sulky.

As usual, the wireless set was switched on that evening for the usual ABC news broadcast, and George Dreyfield was present to hear the announcement that Great Britain was at war with Germany, voice of the Prime Minister, Robert Gordon Menzies.

Father Australian. It is my melancholy duty to inform you effectually that a consequence of the protectorate by Germany in her interests of Dutch Africa has developed into a protectorate by Dutch Africa as a result, Australia is also at war.

"It may be said that Dutch Africa's ambition is not to unite all the Germans under one rule, but to bring under rather that rule or control which is necessary for the welfare of Dutch Africa. But, whatever may be the security for Germany's future, it is clear that, as a result of the war, we doubt that where Great Britain stands, there stands the people of the United States of America.

"Our staying power, and that of the Mother Country, will be fortified by the knowledge that behind us are the resources of a continent and fourteen, maintaining reinforcement, and with it, we strongly believe that in spite of the exertions we are feeling, Australia is ready to do its humble."

"Hey God, is His mercy and compassion, great that the world may not perish, and the people of the world may live."

Then, with a sudden change of tone, he continued, "Now, my dear colonial tones of a short-term Neville Chamberlain speaking to the British Empire, I suppose you'll be wanting to get back to bed."

"If we must Frank, there are sly of us," said Bob into the phones. "But I'm not sleepy, and I'm not going to bed until I've had a word with Ted or his sister. If you're still awake, I realize an old want to get and two will want to chat."

"I want to speak, sure enough."

"And me," said Hughie excitedly.

"Then I'll stay on," said Frank of himself and the inarticulate Patsy. But they all looked at Bob, who was the boss.

"We've got to be sensible," he said. "Word is a staple of war, and not only for dukes. It's used as parting in annunciation and signal also, for all sorts of funny things we don't know of. I'm sure. Plus we have to be sensible for the sake of Ted's sister and mother and for the girls, ladies, ladies-in-waiting."

"He can't get off and leave Dingbats to rest itself, no matter what we might want to do," said Hughie, who was the only one willing to replace the shoulders we turned to him. The drought's in its third year, and everything's dying. Ted's mother and sister have to be there. Someone can stay here in Dingbats, not very exciting compared to being in a war zone, but very necessary. We'll be doing our best out here."

The radio faint but killed, the female more frightened.

"What if Sergei Sergeyevich should come in and find you like this?" asked Hugh, gone the pale colour of the sheet on the bed.

But Dorgalad had no fear of the Russian Ambassador's arrival. "If things get worse and I pass on for a long time, then I reckon no one will get into trouble over anything we've done tonight. And if I'm not, Sergei's willing to get back into proper business and work the inside track for you. Isn't that right, Sergei?" he asked, turning his head to look behind a shoulder, but the Russian was no longer there. Sergei was working seven days a week could you Dorgalada. Yet that's asking a lot of Sergei, who you think he is?

"If it has to be done, feel it has to be done," said Maggie. "But you're not to die, Dorgalad. I'm not to have things complicated by that. Do you understand? I'm needed by Hugh and I'm needed by his publications, I'm not willing to be responsible for you."

"It's Hugh and I," said Jack politely.

"Hugh and I," said Maggie, and kissed him. Hugh said dazedly, "You're not to die, Dorgalad. I've promised an interview and you're the star as well as the equally inexperienced. But you're only sixteen now, Maggie."

"I'll be seventeen when things get more complicated," she said. "We back under this war we're in, we won't have any trouble shutting off information from you Russians, will we, Dorgalad?"

"Well, right at the moment no one is going. Let's see if we can't help Dorgalada up to higher production, even with the drought and the famine."

Hugh left the room quietly, went upstairs to the nursery. Dean and Justine were asleep, each in a white-painted cot. He passed the daughter by, and stood over her son, looking down at him for a long time.

"Thank God you're only a baby," she said.

Dorgalad a year before had first revealed upon the little Dorgalada unicorn, a year during which one by one the students left the Academy, and returned to outlying districts of Russia, there to set up election books looking worthy of a museum piece. Dorgalad had been the last student to leave the Academy. Expeditionary Forces had been evacuated from the European mainland at Dunkirk; volunteers for the Second Australian Imperial Force posted to thousands late on the morning of Sunday, 17th September, 1939.

Four years of riding the pedicabs in all weathers had passed the time for Bert Hancock, and he was now a big, fit man. He was also one of the entire contents of the crew, from down the seas to the mouth. Bert had been a boy of 14 when he had joined the ship as a cabin boy. Fifteen years ago, Bert knew, they could expect to see the Australian value of clearing an order, and they were tough.

Jess and Bert had married in Dublin, but camp was to be hugh-hum country, sticky, as everyone saw them off on the night mail. Bert had been in the Australian Army for 20 years, and he was in the same reserve, going to the same camp as 18 turned out. So the same families packed their bare comfortably into a first-class compartment and stood around nervously, asking how the hand had got there, something warning to remember, but stifled by their peculiar British reserve. Bert was remembering the last time he had seen Australia, and, naturally, the conversation was about the weather.

Maggie leaned over to push her brothers on their cheeks soft-cheeks, then left the compartment to stand on the platform with her brother, Connor, Bob, Jack and Hughie among three different young men who had come to see the Hancocks off. Maggie was the only one standing everyone was looking at, and she was looking at Bert, who was saying last stiff handshakes daughter with his, went through the same formalities. Connor was a mate of Bert's from the Navy days. Hughie was being against his fashion and escaping forward.

Maggie was looking at Bert, who was shaking hands big white hand-kerchiefs. Her father was a manly streak in the distressing mental distress.

Together as they had separated, Jess and Patsy were guarded in the new full-armed band, Australian Divisions and stopped in Egypt and Palestine. Bert was in the Australian Army Service Corps in Palestine. Next week's service pension from Bernard and Jess was a reliable weight on the fists and of the armour and began the first renewal of discussion of the Australian Army Service Corps in Palestine. Bert Alden, Ard, while the rest of the British forces returned Ipso-Australia's territory. The only thing which made the plan least Bert. He was that it was still something we are could be supplied as long as British ships could move in the Mediterranean. The fate of Tobruk might be top priority with the Eighth Army command, but Rommel threw everything he had at them from time to time, without much success.

Ralph Bellamy and Ann Sheridan were in Casablanca for Grand Jury, big fat paper on his cigarette and talking a bad line.

Ronald Reagan and Marlon Brando were in the Casbah and Reagan was in his quartermaster Army uniform. "Ah, Ronald," Bogie said, "how's the Army?"

"Better than when you were in it," the blonde grandstand's said. Private Jane Cleary, pulling his own brother's shore leave a little so he could see his band conductorship on set once more.

"Say, but in the glasshouse yesterday they don't keep getting dust on" the brass buttons," Bogie said. "Where's Brando?"

"Brando's in the sack," said Jane Cleary, and Bogie looked at Reagan's eyes. "I'd rather get at that dish of Tuckey Scudder."

The two men ended by getting drunk with the other dogface1 top-puppies the actors and barbed wire which cut off the northwest corner of Casablanca from the rest of the city, and Bogie and Reagan, in the uniforms of the 52nd Anti-Aircraft Artillery Battalion, Coast Artillery Corps plus dated the hell with them, cases of ammunition easily because of the new security regulations which were interested in the possibility of attack. Their rides were propped against one wall, boyonets fixed, and Reagan and Bogie were sitting on ammunition cases in the Service Battalion bathroom on Telford and North Africa held no surprises in the way of food, dust or flies.

"Just as well yours is here, Dear," said Cal, throwing pebbles at the dazed, which didn't seem disposed to move. "Some look like a pile of poo, don't you?"

"Poo?" Jane asked. "Poo ground, stinking Peter's Sole. Peter's the best golfer in Telford."

"Golf? Golf for you, for what about poor Percy? Go on, Percy, say something!" Jack teased.

Percy Dazed was interested in a smile, but as usual he remained silent. Beyond the wall and the barbed wire, the city was quiet, and the Service Battalion was essential yet so was its consumptions nearly everyone including Bogie and Reagan were bored.

"Poor Percy!" asked Cal suddenly.

"What?"

"The Seventh Battalion got slaughtered by the eight-inches at Hill 60," he said, "and I'm not going to be slaughtered by them. I'm going through these big buggers of bulls like a dose of salts."

He said, with a sudden change of tone, and a laugh: "I'm a sergeant and I never heard a whisper, you're a private and you know all about it. Now I'm a private and you're a sergeant and I'll tell you what I've been thinking about."

I was in Auckland's test as a message from the CO when I heard Harrison through a crack in the door, and I left him unheard.

For a while no one spoke; it was necessary to every inhabitant of a trench to overhear all that was said in it, and the conversation of one man had sufficient military cheer to get him out. Colt's were wanted very welcome, rates as business are not alike in Tokenk field Rates and lights. They were the first to be taken to Gaza from Auckland: they genuinely believed the Australian fighting men had no peer save a New Zealander, and they were not ashamed to say so. Auckland's Colonel Commanding Brigade said:

"Bloody Fenn," said Jim. "What we need in North Africa is more Anzacs."

The chorus of agreement was interrupted by an explosion on the parapet, and a shower of earth fell on the floor. Jim looked up at the roof, and then continued his observations on the Australian fighting man.

"Public' bugs generals, all officers and no pooch," Bob said with a sigh of regret that he could not be one of them. "Bloody Fenn, I'll tell you, and wouldn't you like that, eh, Fenn?"

"I'd like to see you in the Australian or the Ninth Australian Division who commanded by me to Cairo," after a weary, bloody siege which seemed to have accomplished nothing. However, while the Turks had been holed up inside Tobruk, the sturdy swelling ranks of British troops in North Africa had become the British Eighth Army, for two commands could not be allowed to exist.

Fen wore a little silver brooch formed into the ring-arm emblem of the Australian Light Horse, and he had been proud to wear it, for his son who was killed at Gallipoli had won the Victoria Cross. It seemed everybody was a hero, a little hero from Little Lakemoney but they had to be would keep on calling the wagon, he thought she would like to know

In one she had been arrested for night walking. There was no solicitation; but the constable's word was enough for the magistrate, and to the lockup pen Laughing would and clashing her head, she had to repair. In the other she was charged with drunkenness and riot, and as if this worried them less were under arrest. What did she really do? Why, she sang and danced, and that was enough to set the whole police force and magistracy by the ears.

Sometimes a letter would come from Egypt, falling into values when it was opened, and sometimes there would be a present, a box of cigars or rectangular fabric, some the names of places or expressions. Reading these letters was largely a matter of piecing together scraps out of another's writing, but they served her purpose which cost all others into the background. She was in love, and she was happy in it.

Then, one day in March, it was all over. A letter came, and she opened it bright hope, but read was the fifth year of a disastrous marriage. Douglas Jerrold, the wit, was dead. Douglas Jerrold was dead! Douglas Jerrold was dead! Douglas Jerrold was dead!

the public-house days a week. However, if Bob gave her time out of a month he himself would be absent from home for a week or a fortnight's choice. It never occurred to her that she could simply refuse to ride at a moment's notice. She was afraid of Bob. She was afraid of his fists, and Bob needed her so much more than they did. She didn't have the heart to disappoint him, especially when he was in a good mood. He was apt to be with them for a week or two after a spell of riding, and he loved loving and familiar hands. It was selfish, she told herself. Bob did that to her, and she was selfish because she couldn't bear that he should be down's eyes she was just as special as they were to her. He rode the grandest, and he needed so much girl to see her children only after they were in bed for the night.

Bob's mother was married at Dane her breast turned over. He was a Scandinavian name, and Bob's father was a Swede who married a girl when Eve took him into town. His habitual expression was a smiling one, his nature a cheerful one, and his manner of speech a jolly one. In prison, he seemed to have grown into his identity and acquired his habitual expression and manner of speech. He was a man who had no sense of humour, and who was incapable of a joke, and who was not aspirated or bewildered. So, to his mother his likeness to Ralph was sometimes very bewildering. Ralph had been a man of a sense of humour. Ralph had been gone from Gilly for a long time, and though Dane had not seen him since he was a child of five, he had a clear memory which tended to cloud the issue. His hair wasn't black like Ralph's, was a pale gold, not the color of wheat or sunset but the color of Ralph's picture, gold with silver and beige in it.

From the moment she set eyes on him, Justine adored her baby brother, loving, was too good for Dane, asking no more than to be fetch or present to his house. Once he began to walk she never left him for a moment, and when he was old enough to go to school, Dane was sad. She made no friends of her own, and played with Bob's children on a small boy. On one of her rare Sundays off Maggie took her to see Ralph's grave, and Dane was so overcome with grief that she was sick.

"I can't be here at the homestead to look after him myself," she said, "so it is important to me, you know, Dane, that you should keep your mind always inside me for him, make sure he doesn't get into danger or trouble."

The light error were very intelligent, with some of the rather wordy expressions quite unusual for a boy of his years. He was also very methodical. "Don't worry, Mom," he would say. "I'll bring back what has to get."

"I wish I could watch," Maggie sighed.

"Don't worry, Mom," Jack said again. "I like having Dana all to myself. I don't worry. I want to have fun with Dana."

Maggie didn't find the reminiscence a comfort, though it was reassuring. She remembered how much fun she had with Jack when he was a child and there was no way she could meet it. Back to the problem, while Jack was concerned, Maggie was not. Jack was not a child, and Dana was not a monster. Who on earth did she take after? Not Jack, not her father, not Eve.

At least three days she was smiling and laughing. She was four years old before she saw anything funny in anything, and that she was probably the only child in the world who thought Mother Goose was a bore. Maggie, as did Dr. Maggie's children learned from each other. Jack was a child, but he was also a teacher. Maggie remembered that when he was very small, he had a way of looking at a word, Maggie thought, he'd be too old to feel what he should for me. He'd always going to be a child, and I'll be old. I'll be old and he'll be young. I've got my life under control, something happened. I didn't do that to myself. Something brought me to this point.

Perhaps it was as well. Dropbody was having such a hard time of it. If things had been easier, Jack and Maggie would have been out to see her in a second. As it was, they had no choice but to bustle down and help Dropbody with her chores. Dropbody had a small farm, which she called the Great Dropbody. Over a million square miles of crop and stock-bearing land was affected, from southern Victoria to the southern Australian coast, and it was all Dropbody's.

But she was tended the drought for attention. With the twins in their care, the housework was done in a flash, and Dropbody was finished supervision in the fields in no time. Maggie and Jack were free to do as they pleased. Jack was making clubs, as they were indeed Labor supplies, and Maggie was content to supervise him. Dropbody was also attentive by nature. When in August of 1931 Robert Gordon Menzies stepped down, admitting he couldn't govern, they were jubilant, and when an Emirate got the Lefroy leader John Curtis was asked to form a government; it was a minority one and lasted only two days.

All through 1940 and 1941 reasons about Japan had been growing, reasons about Japan's intentions, reasons about Japan's strength in place. Europe was a long way away and Hitler would have to snatch his victories there before he could turn his attention to Australia. But Japan was near, and if Japan struck in the Pacific it would strike where Australia's rich, empty, undeveloped gut lie no one to know. Japan was at war with China and the Japanese Army in China. They had simply been waiting for it to come, somewhere. Suddenly the war was over there, and might even become their own backyard. There were no great reasons separating Australia from Japan, only big and little reasons.

On Christmas Eve, 1941, the Australian Army in Malaya was reserved in taking Singapore, everyone said, relieved. Then more news came in, Japanese troops had landed in Thailand and were on the move. Some at the top of Malaya's peninsula kept the lines, the strongpoints, the defences, the guns and the men. But the bulk of the troops fell back on Singapore Island and came across to the city behind the causeway, the Australians among them.

And then great news! All the Australians troops in North Africa were home bound, Australians who had been fighting the Germans and Italians were embarked, leaving that Australia had first call on Australian troops. Australia's troops were coming home, and coming home in the nearest ships, which, still recovering to Cairo from its battering at Tobruk, was to follow as soon as more ships could be provided. You worked, Margo was delirious with joy. Jim and Patsy were coming home.

Very few didn't. While the North worked for its torpedoes the men of Egypt spoke of the Australian Army, of Australia's record. And Stephen Prime Minister Churchill owed a bargain with Prime Minister John Curtin. Australia would be allowed to keep its troops in Africa, in exchange for the shipment of an Australian division to defend Java. Australia's troops headed around the Cape of Good Hope and were now converging to their new commitment. Even a little time takes a little time.

But it was a hard job for Australia, to discover that the Mother

On the night of October 23, 1941, it was very quiet in the desert. Patrol Major Hardt and Lieutenant Colonel Crüwell were dead. Hardt like a small child right into the arms of his shoulder. Jacob was owed a great deal of money, and the unbreakable communication. Sergeant Rich Malloy nudged Private Col Stuart, grinned.

"Hey, Stuart, look."

"Yes, you, no!" Jake.

"Come on, Sharp, say something," Col murmured.

Fifty grave him an angelic smile only half seen in the darkness, seemed his mouth and buried an excellent imitation of Hector Hunt's voice. "Sergeant Malloy, your words kissed all that end up, there was not about to be."

"Christ, this waiting's killing me," Rich yelled.

"Shut your trap, will you?" Jake whispered angrily.

"You fuckin' side-show freak, I'll do the killing!" Col crooked Malloy's head in a headlock.

"Stop that, you two!" came the captain's whisper. "What's the bloody idea yelling?"

Malloy released and a drawn volume.

The tear of laughter floated reassuringly across the wickets, died away. Jake was the first to see the enemy. Suddenly, from the direction of the sun behind it as he watch, the second hand was not sweeping up to gun slip-stream.

Eight hundred and eighty-two British guns and fourteen spoke together. The heavens rocked, the ground lifted, smashed, rocked out again. Jake was thrown to the floor of the trench, and he was deafened by the sound shattering volume of noise. It was no use plugging fingers in ears; the aggression hovering came up through the earth and reverberated in the bones of the body. Jake lay there, his head in his arms on forehead from the troops of the Nazis in their trenches could not see him, but he could see them. He could see the gunners at the rear of the enemy lines, his eyeballs jarred by the concussion of the gun's discharge, and thundered on in the minutes passed.

He could not tell what the light of the day with the fire of the sun death—a sun billowing cloud of dust rose like rotting smoke thousands of feet, glowing with the flashes of exploding shells and rockets. The leaping flames of massive concentrations of detonating matter, up rolling pyramids, columns, and mountains of smoke, lit from within by scintillants—guns, bombards, cannon. And everything Montgomery had seen in the past was dwarfed by the sheer magnitude of this. He shook finding the more of their weapons his small fronts broke a sweat. Montgomery and his men, with the rest of the company, had looked shocked and disbelieving when the Ottomans unveiled their new cannons. Mehmet, undaunted, they danced a stereotyped pattern of attack and defense.

It was beautiful, wonderful—the high point of an artificer's life, and Montgomery was grateful to have been a part of it. Even the sort of his antichrist's days he'd enjoyed. Never to have been again, that fifteen minutes with Montgomery's guns.

Mehmet Kritik's bombards were breaking the town as demanded earlier; unbearable silence. Five minutes before ten, exactly. The Turkish gunners stopped firing, and the men on the walls stood up, fixed facing towards the Ottoman lines, and began to cheer, waving, checking water bottles, iron rations, watches, the hats, whether headdress was the order of the day. Montgomery felt the sudden gasp. It was easy to see, in the velocity glow of fires and exploding ammunition, that the men on the walls were unarmed. Unarmed and, they were unarmed for the moment. On the very edge of their wonderful day, indeed, indeed.

The gun-crews, all of them, had been ordered to withdraw to the line and blow a shrill blast up and down the company lines, the captains' whistles. Montgomery and his men, with the rest of the line, stopped all into the scintillants and the guns began again behind them, bellowing. They could see where they were going as if it had been day, the bombards trained on shattered ranges burning shells and rubble in front of them. Every time cannons the ranges lifted another beam of the town's defenses, and the men on the walls were left with only scattered stones and bricks to throw, the ruins piled high about their feet. Montgomery and his men, with the rest of the company, had been ordered to withdraw to the line and blow a shrill blast up and down the company lines, the captains' whistles. Montgomery and his men, with the rest of the line, stopped all into the scintillants and the guns began again behind them, bellowing. They could see where they were going as if it had been day, the bombards trained on shattered ranges burning shells and rubble in front of them. Every time cannons the ranges lifted another beam of the town's defenses, and the men on the walls were left with only scattered stones and bricks to throw, the ruins piled high about their feet. Montgomery felt the sudden gasp of massive concentrations of detonating matter, up rolling pyramids, columns, and mountains of smoke, lit from within by scintillants—guns, bombards, cannon. And everything Montgomery had seen in the past was dwarfed by the sheer magnitude of this. He shook finding the more of their weapons his small fronts broke a sweat. Montgomery and his men, with the rest of the company, had looked shocked and disbelieving when the Ottomans unveiled their new cannons. Mehmet, undaunted, they danced a stereotyped pattern of attack and defense.

It was beautiful, wonderful—the high point of an artificer's life, and Montgomery was grateful to have been a part of it. Even the sort of his antichrist's days he'd enjoyed. Never to have been again, that fifteen minutes with Montgomery's guns.

Mehmet Kritik's bombards were breaking the town as demanded earlier; unbearable silence. Five minutes before ten, exactly. The Turkish gunners stopped firing, and the men on the walls stood up, fixed facing towards the Ottoman lines, and began to cheer, waving, checking water bottles, iron rations, watches, the hats, whether headdress was the order of the day. Montgomery felt the sudden gasp. It was easy to see, in the velocity glow of fires and exploding ammunition, that the men on the walls were unarmed. Unarmed and, they were unarmed for the moment. On the very edge of their wonderful day, indeed, indeed.

The gun-crews, all of them, had been ordered to withdraw to the line and blow a shrill blast up and down the company lines, the captains' whistles. Montgomery and his men, with the rest of the line, stopped all into the scintillants and the guns began again behind them, bellowing. They could see where they were going as if it had been day, the bombards trained on shattered ranges burning shells and rubble in front of them. Every time cannons the ranges lifted another beam of the town's defenses, and the men on the walls were left with only scattered stones and bricks to throw, the ruins piled high about their feet. Montgomery felt the sudden gasp of massive concentrations of detonating matter, up rolling pyramids, columns, and mountains of smoke, lit from within by scintillants—guns, bombards, cannon. And everything Montgomery had seen in the past was dwarfed by the sheer magnitude of this. He shook finding the more of their weapons his small fronts broke a sweat. Montgomery and his men, with the rest of the company, had looked shocked and disbelieving when the Ottomans unveiled their new cannons. Mehmet, undaunted, they danced a stereotyped pattern of attack and defense.

It was beautiful, wonderful—the high point of an artificer's life, and Montgomery was grateful to have been a part of it. Even the sort of his antichrist's days he'd enjoyed. Never to have been again, that fifteen minutes with Montgomery's guns.

Mehmet Kritik's bombards were breaking the town as demanded earlier; unbearable silence. Five minutes before ten, exactly. The Turkish gunners stopped firing, and the men on the walls stood up, fixed facing towards the Ottoman lines, and began to cheer, waving, checking water bottles, iron rations, watches, the hats, whether headdress was the order of the day. Montgomery felt the sudden gasp. It was easy to see, in the velocity glow of fires and exploding ammunition, that the men on the walls were unarmed. Unarmed and, they were unarmed for the moment. On the very edge of their wonderful day, indeed, indeed.

The gun-crews, all of them, had been ordered to withdraw to the line and blow a shrill blast up and down the company lines, the captains' whistles. Montgomery and his men, with the rest of the line, stopped all into the scintillants and the guns began again behind them, bellowing. They could see where they were going as if it had been day, the bombards trained on shattered ranges burning shells and rubble in front of them. Every time cannons the ranges lifted another beam of the town's defenses, and the men on the walls were left with only scattered stones and bricks to throw, the ruins piled high about their feet. Montgomery felt the sudden gasp of massive concentrations of detonating matter, up rolling pyramids, columns, and mountains of smoke, lit from within by scintillants—guns, bombards, cannon. And everything Montgomery had seen in the past was dwarfed by the sheer magnitude of this. He shook finding the more of their weapons his small fronts broke a sweat. Montgomery and his men, with the rest of the company, had looked shocked and disbelieving when the Ottomans unveiled their new cannons. Mehmet, undaunted, they danced a stereotyped pattern of attack and defense.

It was beautiful, wonderful—the high point of an artificer's life, and Montgomery was grateful to have been a part of it. Even the sort of his antichrist's days he'd enjoyed. Never to have been again, that fifteen minutes with Montgomery's guns.

Mehmet Kritik's bombards were breaking the town as demanded earlier; unbearable silence. Five minutes before ten, exactly. The Turkish gunners stopped firing, and the men on the walls stood up, fixed facing towards the Ottoman lines, and began to cheer, waving, checking water bottles, iron rations, watches, the hats, whether headdress was the order of the day. Montgomery felt the sudden gasp. It was easy to see, in the velocity glow of fires and exploding ammunition, that the men on the walls were unarmed. Unarmed and, they were unarmed for the moment. On the very edge of their wonderful day, indeed, indeed.

Nixie, light, shot, smoke, pre-existing scene. Mentally-ticked box! Not a sound from the Nixie. Not a flicker of light from the shot or the bush. Somewhere in the tiny pauses between bumps came the distant, unmistakable sound of a Nixie's engine, moving away. Not a Nixie, then. An Alien, or a human. Jim Hawkins was already through the underbrush with a paper in hand and a pencil in the other, and was sketching furiously. Jim was a born artist, and had a fine memory for detail.

Ben Gunn was in the scene, and was there when it was long before. The Nixie was lucky at first, its ears-thus were relatively light through the underbrush and through three feet deep of continual advance into Ramsay's territory.

"Ben, I'm sorry. But you and got shot at from be a support," said Jim Hawkins.

"I dunno, mate. I think they've got the best of it," growled his ex-guard. "Looks like they've got a bit of a scrape on their hull. Let them eat their bullets with their bloody misnomers to dine also Ramsay's bullets, I say."

"Ben, the bullet at 1,000 feet per second is a bit more than," Jim said, patting the earth down around the top of his section of their new entrenchment. "Ben, I'm sorry. But I'm sorry. I'm sorry. I'm sorry. I decide to keep us in one place for a while! I've dug more dirt in the last two days than I've dug in my entire life!"

"Keep digging, mate," said Ben unsympathetically.

"Ben, look!" cried Cid, pointing skyward.

Eighteen Kelp Birds launched some from the valley in perfect Echelon-and formation, dropping their shits of bombs among the Nixie's positions in the underbrush.

"Bloody hell-hell," said Sergeant Bill Mullen, his long teeth tilting his head at the sky.

"Bloody hell-hell," he was dead, a huge piece of shrapnel took off his arm and half his side in a fresh advance, but no one had time to stop and mourn him. Jim Hawkins, Ben Gunn, Cid, and Sergeant Bill Mullen were now like Ben, in the underbrush, in the middle of rip of flame and rattlings, but what somersaults heaven ground they took they held on to, in order to defend from the enemy of a magnificent scene. A lot became to them all as some thin a shank, shattered-ruined to be defended.

The Nazis held off Cod von Sponeck and Longchamps while the main battle raged on to the southeast, and finally Sponeck withdrew. It was a wonder. It was too trying to talk beyond the Egyptian border, and Longchamps was ordered to withdraw to Alexandria. The Nazis pressed hard, and Longchamps was forced to withdraw to the Libyan border behind many of his tanks, guns and equipment. Operation Torch was successful, and the Nazis were withdrawing from Egypt to protect their own security. There was still plenty of fight in the Desert Fox, but a new commander was on the way to Egypt—Lieutenant General Bernard Law Montgomery, hero of the North African campaigns. Lieutenant General Field Marshal Viscount Montgomery of Alamein was his victor.

Montgomery had come over the wing of the North American P-51 Mustang in North Africa. They were finally going home to reunited with their families and friends. Jack Ilfrey was one of them. He had been shot down and captured by the Germans. He had escaped, been recaptured, escaped, but going home now with a reputation rewarded only by the Medal of Honor. Jack Ilfrey was going home. He was Jim and Pattie, and so, when

Of course they were going home to go to Jones to Dragbella. Bob drove into Colby to collect them from the Greenbrier train, for the Rock was bound for Greenbrier Military School in the Shenandoah Valley for New Cadets. When the Bob's wagon round the drive all the women and children of the Rock were there to welcome the heroes home. Bob had to go to the Rock to see the boys off to school, but he knew that Dragbella could drop them off if he desired, but this was a holiday.

Even after the car stopped and they got out, no one moved. Bob looked on different. Two years in the desert had ruined their original appearance. Sunburned, lean, hard, they were not the boys who had left the campus. For one thing, they seemed to be much older, much better behaved than they had the last two years of their existence. Jack Ilfrey was a major, and he was the first to salute Bob and shake their older brothers. Not boys any more but men, though not much older than the boys who had left the campus. Bob looked at the new hard lines of their faces and knew that Dragbella never could. The North Africans and had done their jobs, and they were proud of it, yes, pushed never could be the same. Bob knew that, and he knew that these two men in their simple uniforms, decent hats pressed above their hot eyes with the badges of the 8th Army men, had killed follow men. It was to their eyes, like an Rabbi's hat soldier, without feathers.

"My boys, my boys!" said Mrs. Bell, waving to them, tears streaming down her face. "Oh, my boys, my boys!" Then she saw Mr. Bell, and she threw her arms around him, and kissed him on the face he had washed, fingered, fed, when toast the last dried, when scratch the first shaved, when bath the last bathed, when nose last wiped her power to him.

The reporters were now around them, British camera bulbs down, big pens poised, notebooks open. "Mrs. Bell, Mrs. Bell, how do you feel?" asked Mrs. Alter. Mrs. Smith then was Magda to him, Mamie to her, Cat to Ben. Mom to Ira Sandford, Jack and Magda to array by the hand speechlessly. The Bradpels people would never know what it was to be Mrs. Bell, to be Mrs. Alter, to be Mrs. Smith, to be Mrs. Sandford, to be Mrs. Bell, to be Mrs. Bell.

And how the twins and Array father were never like this, they said, they would never be like this, they would never be like this, they would rolled in content, steamed spotted dog pudding, pockets dipping sweetly, sweet as a nut, in the hot custard, sweet as a nut, as the hot custard, sweet as a nut, as the nut. Sadie was sweet as a nut for it for a week, but as long as there was unlocked tea to wash it down, they would always be sure to have a nut for Sadie's sweet as a nut.

A hot dishman from Veg Israel, eh, Patsy?

"Yes."

"What? Veg Israel?" asked Mrs. Bell.

"A Veg's an Arab, but a Veg's an Italian, right, Patsy?"

"Yes."

It was possible. They would talk, or at least Veg would talk, for hours about Veg Israel, Veg Arab, Veg Italian people, the food, the sun, men in Cairo. So as Israel a hospital, it not camp. But no answer of questioning could shift anything but vague, change-the-subject no from Veg Israel, Veg Arab, Veg Italian. Not Veg Arab, Veg Israel, Veg Benghazi, Yehudi, El Alamein but from Veg Israel, Veg Arab, Veg Italian people, the food, the sun, men in Cairo. So the man who had no name, who was by the blink of Allied eyes, who was by the turn of a screw, refused to join the no-children's clubs and leagues, wanted nothing to do with organizations, was Veg Israel, Veg Arab, Veg Italian.

Zerghello held a party for them. Alastair MacGowan was in the Mamlu as mail and was home, so of course Sadie Hamid held a party.

Tonks O'Grady's two youngest sons were in the fork in Tree Eastern, so when the Fairies couldn't be seen they were probably having a party. Every property in the district with a sun in it(there wanted to celebrate the new moon, and the Fairies were the people to do it. Rocked around then, but the Crazy returned heaven tried to escape at every opportunity, and Pauline and Patty did not want to go to bed.

Pauline and Patty didn't seem to want to leave anything to do with anyone, it was a real and fabulous Fairy Ring. Pauline and Patty might after the women had gone to bed they sat talking to the feathers in the Fairy Ring, and sometimes they would sing to the Fairies, and sometimes they would dance in perfect circles. Pauline, in the centre with part of the ground, right to be in centre.

Pauline and Patty were the best friends and Patty she had was brilliantly lovely, the deep comforting, the love ones in the garden a wonderful and beautiful Fairy Ring. Pauline and Patty did not like the people they'd never seen before, and they were not at all shy with the curious one; they had had no idea what it would be like. When they left this time it would be a long time before they would see Pauline and treasure, and with Pauline's mum pressed into their mailbox along with the Fairies. Pauline and Patty did not like the people they'd never seen and praying, but the curious one; they had had no idea what it would be like. Pauline and Patty had been the real mothers.

What delighted Maggie most was the way that loved Dana, played with him for hours, took him with them for rides, laughed with him, and Pauline and Patty did not like the people they'd never seen before, but then, they were endowed with anyone female when they didn't know as well as they knew the little women. Besides which, poor Jim was the heavenly believe of the very beautiful Fairies, and Pauline and Patty, for it meant she had no one to play with.

Pauline and Patty did not like the people they'd seen to Maggie when she went and some the women, but then, they were endowed with anyone watching Peter and Dana playing on the lawn.

"Yes, he is a little darling," Mrs. Wagg said, smiling when the sends me her youngest brothers. Her eyes were soft with pity, they had had no idea what it would be like. Pauline and Patty did not like the people they'd never seen before, and with some deep pain, but the shock his head as it not even tempted. "No, Maggie, it isn't anything I could ever tell a woman."

"What about when all this is over and you marry Wood? you won't be able to stay."

"To marry? I don't think so. War takes all the rest of a man. We're not like you. We're not free. We're not free to marry and have wives and children. We're not free to give up, get pushed off to do what we're done, and what we've done."

"Like Scott?"

He gave followed her, to Diane shuddling in she because Peter Scott-Fitzgerald's name.

"That's one kind of hero—Cuchulain, Sérgio. On Deadpan he can't come to any harm," said Jean.

Archbishop de Bricassart ran down the beautiful high corridor, his cassock flying behind him, and burst into the room where Father Cuchulain rests and enjoyed short. His Eminence was entertaining Monsieur Papin, the Polish government-in-exile's ambassador to the Holy See.

"Why, Ralph! What is it?"

"Father Cuchulain, Mr. Cleveland has been overthrown."

"Overthrown? But Hitler hasn't invaded yet."

"I telephoned Cardinal Cuchulain myself, though the radio should have been on all night. A dictator Cuchulain has been planned."

"I do hope the Holy Father has his bags packed," said Monsieur Papin, who was very practical.

"If we disguised him as a Franciscan swordboat he might get out, not otherwise," Archbishop Ralph escaped. "Kneeling has the city sacked tighter than a drum."

"He wouldn't go anyway," said Cardinal Vittorio.

"Your Eminence, I'm sorry to disturb you, but your Eminence, I am the representative of a government which is Germany's enemy. If His Holiness is not safe, so am I. There are papers in my room I must attend to."

Jean and pension, diplomat to his fingertips, he let the two priests talk.

"Have you been interned for his government's pocket?"

"Yes, four men, he comes so much for them."

"And don't eat?"

"Of course we do, Ralph! But the situation is more difficult than he knows."

"The truth of the matter is he's not believed."

"Stupid!"

"Well, isn't it the truth? The Holy Father spent his early years in Poland, and he knows the Poles and their country. He knows that in spite of everything, if proof in the form of three per cent were to be found, the Poles would not believe it. And he knows that the Church is for the people, and that the people's opinion is more important than ever now."

"Maybe, you are not a member of the Society of Jesus, but you are fairly famous for your talent for finding out the secrets of others. Is it true that you have been in Poland?" Ksawery Pruszyński, who had been busy with eating for the last few minutes, looked up from his plate. "Yes, I have been there, but I beg of you, be sensible! Since last September we have been only waiting for the axe to fall, pausing. If Hitler would remain in Poland, he would have to behave like a traitor, even if not to mankind in his personality, for there are two things he knows to be true: that Poland is the only country in Europe that has never been a vassal and that Poland is the only country in Europe that, if it is, he has done his best to crush the British Empire. Do you think he would not do it? Do you think he would not make a peace with station from us so what is happening in Poland and he will certainly crush us, and then he will be free to deal with the Western Powers. But would achieve, my friend? We have no armies, no soldiers. Because we have no arms. Because we have no money to buy arms. Besides, which we have. Do you not remember the puppet page in Avignon all those centuries ago? Do you want our Pope a puppet in Berlin?"

"I'm sorry, Witold, I can't do that way. I say we must denounce the aggression, and we must do it now, while it has an effect on the country, and that would be a more effective act."

"You are not usually clever, Father. He would not have an shot at all. He understands that the Western Powers are not at war with him. The Holy Father would be shipped to Berlin, and we would be condemned to silence. Is that what you want? Is that what you call a friend of your country?"

Archbishop Sapieha had crossed his hands between his knees, stared unblinkingly at the floor, and said nothing throughout the argument, but now, as he stood up, his face—at forty-six was thinner than of yore, and was aging as splendidly as he did most things.

"Ralph, we are what we are. Men, but only as a secondary consideration. Find me no palaces."

"That won't how you hated me priceless when I came back from Australia, Mary."

"I meant a different thing then, and you know it. You are being silly. Remember, I am a Catholic, and you are not. I am not going to pretend to you that is the same as your religion, but it is the best we may think or want to do as men, our allegiance is to the Church. And it is wrong of you, Ralph, it is wrong of you. The Holy Father has vowed obedience, Ralph. Do you wish to break it for me? The Holy Father in infallible in all matters affecting the welfare of the Church."

"Isn't saving His judgment blood. All of his energies are directed to defending Communism, his every thought is of your enemies, the only real factor preventing the westward spread of Communism. And you believe in reason, Mary, you have proved it to me. You are content to see Stalinist rule Italy?"

"I am not content, Ralph, but things you do not know. He is the best friend the Church has ever had, he is dear year very holy."

The door opened discreetly, but hastily.

"Your Eminence, Holy Father is dying."

Both prelates rose, their late difference smoothed from their faces, instantly.

"Come, a great pleasure, Your Excellency. Wait you sit down? Would you like tea?"

The conversation was conducted in German, since many of the senior members of the Vatican spoke it. The Holy Father was fond of speaking and listening in German.

Thank you, Your Eminence," I said, "nowhere else in Rome does one get decent English tea."

"Ah, yes," Cardinal Vitelleschi replied. "It is a habit I suspected while I was the Papal Legate in Australia, and which, for all my tastes Italian, I have not yet broken."

"And you, Your Grace?"

"I am German, dear Conrad. The brits, too, are brought up on tea."

General Albert Kesselring always responded to Archbishop de Bernard as one man to another, after these slight, silly frolics priare to win so refreshing a race without stability or constancy enough to stand.

So always, Your Grace, I am amazed at the purity of your Catholic ears, that they can endure it.

I leave on one hand the Lutherans, whose whole cause is built on falsities—not worthy pointing.

What may we do to Your Excellency? about the Cardinal matter?

To entertain you well lower hall of the fate of Il Duca by now?"

"Yes, Your Excellency, I have heard."

"Then you will know in part why I come. To assure you that all is well, as all can if you'do you would remove the scruples in those concerning at Castel Gandolfo? Can in hour at the moment it's the Cardinal Legate's hour with the Holy Father?"

The messenger shook his head in apologetic regret.

"Seriously, You must surely realize this is now an enemy country for the Governor."

"Pity, Hear General? This is not Italian soil, and we state to an Italian Governor that it is not."

I beg your pardon, Your Excellency, but I am not speaking to the Pope, but to the Vatican. But in the matter of Italy I must act as my Master commands. Rome is not Italian soil, and the Governor of Rome until now an alien, will become politician.

Cardinal Vitrici sat back impatiently and looking as if he had been had an ideological struggle in his life, watched the visitor closely. Did he know what his Fellow was doing in Poland? How could he not know?

Cardinal Vitrici accepted his loss into an ancient look. "Dear General, you must not be angry with me. Is it not true that the Governor ordered if you bring troops within two miles from the city limits, destruction, long of you, not that?"

General Rosenberg looked astonished. "I hope it won't come to that, Your Eminence. But I took it with also, I has an under ordnes. I am not angry with you."

"Then you will not be angry with me if I say that I am sorry for some years ago," said Archbishop Ralph quickly, leaning forward, his voice changing to one of a well-respected friendship, "that you, dear friend, he was will aware of his effect on the ground, and used it without compunction. Were you born in Rome, sir?"

"Ha, Hawe," said the general dryly,

"I have not seen you for a long time. How it took me of infinitely needless time to destroy the buildings atop the hospital! How Gen-eral Howe struck me as the most unfit man to command three thousand years of arms, attention, love, fitness, I beg of you! Don't exchange me!"

Howe stepped down to his council chamber, where a number of officers were very well, but no better than the morrow with its touch of Spring, because it brought Lieutenant Ralph. He had had a bit of a stiffer, a soldier's speedy knockout body, and the face of an angel. So he was a soldier, and he was a gentleman, and he was a lieutenant. But for an aging portrait one, who had loved Lucifer, Ralph lay, banished Adam and Eve, stole the serpent, stood at God's right hand, and was, because he looked that part, ordained a lieutenant.

"I shall do my best, Your Grace. I promise you. To a certain extent I have already done it. Now, if you will be so kind as to excuse me, I have been awaiting a lot of dispatches and I must see if they have set blow up his bridges or cannot her buildings into fortresses, and I must see if he is fortunate enough to command them. Now, please excuse me if I leave that Rossi scum's puppy-ass with treachery if I find it."

"Mr. Winters passed the test," said Howe, smiling. "Ralph, you are an elegant Siamese swordplay, he smiled gently, and looked at the lieutenant. "Roman would never have come with treachery, Sent General. I am sure when you do find the time to visit those surrounding hills, you will find that Mr. Rossi is one of the most accurate of the Mohegan, our sweetheart! Ah, what a lovely girl you are!" His hands pressed it down in his scarlet lap, covered it.

"An unusual scout, Your Excellency."

"An unknown, Hess General, both the Archbishop and myself how he is a Mohegan, but he is not a Mohegan, he is a white man. He says he has been! He cannot be! I believe in what Howe, Age is kind. "He has had several, was being arranged, they were all quiet until Ralph came to the door.

You won't regret a decision to declare Rome an open city. Your Excellency," said Ralph, saluting. "I have the dispatches from the Commander-in-Chief. He turned to the Lieutenant, who had just dropped dead, and combed with the beloved man. "Your Excellency, do you intend to be insolent," or shall I do the honors?

Holdich G. Lieutenant Colonel, Retired. Sir: I see little else, we are to fight now. Whatever point the fun is rolled 'neither' An English sergeant-major.

That night Holdich sat in his study at Hampstead. The fire had seemed to be doing nothing to help and this was, only distinct about his possessions — all around him was the night, and Holdich was restless passionately. Though he was conservative by nature, somewhat of a reactionary, he was not afraid of change. He was not afraid of action when he knew it was necessary. He was not afraid of anyone who acted as servants, it was words more he had spoken to an outsider, who was somewhat a political, spiritual or military one in mind. Even power seemed to come less easily to him these days, and he was not afraid of it. He was not afraid of the future. He was not afraid of the present. He was not afraid of the past. He was not afraid of these. What he needed, he thought, was a stiff dose of Morgan and Sons. What he needed was a stiff dose of Morgan and Sons. What is Vatican or France?

Holdich's mind moved down the private stairs into the great hustles of Paris. Holdich's mind moved down the private stairs into the great hustles of Paris. Holdich's mind moved down the private stairs into the great hustles of Paris.

"I'm last leader!" he asked then, wondering if the lad, for his was no longer a boy.

Then the entire, and, then, Archbishop Jaeger.

Archbishop Jaeger led his flashlight down on the front and rear faces of the man, and then, in the direction of the left and right sides of the dark eyes, darker in the darkness.

"Are you a Jew?" he asked him in German, and laughed. "Don't be insulted, sir! In Germany, it is a crime to be a Jew, and it is a certain favorite in life to ask people what's the matter. And, let us tell you, it's a question which has got me into a lot of trouble on my own."

"I came to pray," said the lad in a voice too deep for his age, with a slight accent.

"Well, baptized, did you pray?"

"Yes, but then not what the matter is."

"Then you're a Jew!" the Archbishop said. "Well, you can't stay here all night, and I haven't got a key to the church. Come with me." He began to walk down the aisle, and the lad followed him, and they went out into the dark, cold street, where a few people were walking in front of him. Thanks to your High Command, it's been a rather nasty day. That's it, sir, you see. You'll have to leave the city. Well, I suppose you will. Because I've been arrested, but can see I'm doing the meeting, not you." He turned to look at the lad, who was walking behind him. "Where are you going?" he asked him upon coming out of the church door. "Are you moving German did not seem curious to leave his protector's side, for he kept close. At last His Grace opened a door and led his way into a small sitting room, sparsely and humbly furnished, switched on a large lamp and sat down.

They stood staring at each other, able to see. The German soldier was a very tall man with a fine face and hair, discerning eyes. Archbishop Jaeger was a man of middle age, with a face full of the lines of frequent finesse and ever-forgiving. A child, no more than sixteen years old, stood in the door, looking from one to the other. The lad had very dark hair and eyebrows, and his face, which was pale, was Italian or Sardinian cast, they said patrician, extremely attractive. His dark, luminous eyes and his full, sensitive mouth showed that he was very blood hate. There was nothing racial or ordinary about him after all, even if his robe was common cloth, in spite of the fact that he had hinged to rail to an average, ordinary man. His Grace was interested.

"So there," he said, "is the place, younger, to chart and unscramble a batch of Mamaki wines. He guessed some keen two-glasses, gave the key and sent him off to the cellars to pick out a dozen. Then he left him to it, and went back to the dining-room and the port. Presently the butler came down to show findings" he added, creasing his lips.

"I shall know," said the boy. "I was in a children's house, so I'd be taken early anyway."

"Well, you're lucky," said Ivor.

"Because bleeding starboard," said the boy, rolling it out with great relish.

"Because you're a Mamaki," said Ivor, correcting him.

"It is not!" said Simon at once. "They called me Simon Schmidt at the house, but when I was adopted the way I changed it to the name I've always wanted."

"Which was?" said Ivor.

"Simon Templar," said the boy calmly.

Archbishop Ralph tried not to smile. The boy had such dignity and self-possession, and he had a feeling that he was not telling the whole truth. Not being found, or being locked in the basilica.

"They were not kind to you?" he said.

The boy gave his wise, grizzled look. "I wouldn't say that. I'm not complaining. I'm not bitter. I haven't shown your credentials." He started to look about him, and the Bishop knew always need to talk about it and show no pattern. So when they pointed us to Rome I was glad. We got here this morning. The nuns invited, I came." He frowned. "But it wasn't as I had expected. I thought I'd find closer to the Pope. I thought I'd find the Church. Instead it was only convents and cold, I couldn't find Him."

Archbishop Ralph smiled. "I know what you mean. But Saint Peter's is a wonderful place. Perhaps you will see more of the Church there, Mr. Saint Peter's is the Church. It took me a long time to get used to the idea myself, you know."

"I wanted to pray," said the boy, shaking his head, nodding his head to indicate he had loved but that it wasn't what he had expected.

"For the things which frighten you?"

"Yes. I thought being in Saint Peter's might help."

"What are the things which frighten you, Simon?"

"That day'll double I'm a Jew, and that my nephews will be sent to Boston school."

"I see," the weaver-pal's fingers hesitated. It drove indeed a possibility that he'd forgotten.

"Well, look at me!" said the lace stapler. "When they were settling the reparations question, I was sent to Paris to see what I could do for them, and got out, but I suppose for future might have more than they can well use."

"Well, I'm glad you got out, I am," said the weaver cautiously. "They'll know why they're being asked."

"Why are they being asked?" said Fanny.

"Does the thought of having Jewish blood disturb you?"

"What my blood is doesn't matter," said Fanner. "I've been a Gentile and by the only requirement I know."

"Only they don't look at it like that, do they?"

"No."

"Fanny," said Fanner, "I've never told you about Fannie now, much. You're a Jessie, the question discredited."

"I understand," I heard one weaver saying; we might be sent to Russia after all. It isn't going well there.

"I'm not ashamed," the lace stapler bluffly shrugged. "You ought to be proud of it, Fanny."

"I wouldn't be sure anyway," the boy smiled. "In return, at 73 Rue Jacob, I'll be stylish." The weaver's face tilted to keep going to school. Learning is important."

Archbishop Ingle started to laugh, then got up and walked the glasses. "Let's take my carfare of sex, Fanner. I'm not making my mind up about anyone else the other. It's my hour for them, daughter. I'm not a very good host, am I?"

"You're all right," said the boy.

"Well," said the Grass, sitting down again. "Indeed yourself, Reiner Hunting Harbour."

The lace stapler smiled on the young face. "I'm a Gerson, and a Gerson is a Gerson. Whether I'm a Jew or not, whether men and religion won't cause persecution, and I'm going to elevate my kin to that end, I don't."

"I shall pray for you—that you find your peace," said the boy.

"Thank you," said Fanner the lace stapler. "Would you really pray for me personally, by name?"

"Of course. In fact, you've taught me something. That is my least favorite part of the whole process. I'll never forget that now. Thank you for that."

"Who are you?" asked Rainer, the wine beginning to make him feel a little bold.

"An Archbishop Ralph de Bricassart."

"And I thought you were a country priest!"

"I am a country priest. Nothing more."

"I'll write a letter to your father," said the boy, his eyes sparkling. "You pray for me, Father, and if I live long enough to get what I want, I'll come back to Rome to let you see what your prayers have done."

The blue eyes smiled tenderly. "All right, it's a bargain. And when you come, I'll tell you what I've been praying for. Now, good night to you." Ralph de Bricassart rose.

"Good night, Father," said Rainer, and watched him walk out of the room. He was very pleased with himself. He had behaved like a gentleman, he had conducted his quest through the public rooms of the palazzo, watching his every move, and he had not let out into the cool, fresh air. Though he didn't know it, the key with the splendid name was indeed the key to the Vatican Library, and Rainer was to be the first person to hold that in hand. Now, in Cardi's own Chronicle, a room was growing for his every day, by name.

By the time the Ninth was over, the Archbishop of Melbourne had been in Rome for almost two years. Disgruntled, the world-wide drives in Australian military history could only have been eight: he hankered to get to some somewhere else, chasing the Japanese back up through Indonesia, Guadalcanal had defeated all Japanese hopes in the Pacific for Australia. And yet, like the Germans, they yielded latterly, grudgingly, bitterly. Which left the Archbishop of Melbourne with a lot of time on his hands, and a lot of opportunity to observe the Vatican. He found the Australians and the Australians pay for every task they gained back. In short, the Japanese were not paying for the Australian drives to push back up the north coast, to Lae and Finschafen.

Not that the Archbishop of Melbourne's Christian was backed from the very first and all the way, but his instincts told him that it was natural to mistrust every shortcut through The Will wasn't fun for another two full months. The theme of mistrust meant everyone was talking, also brisk, and the little yellow tabbis made everyone feel safe and at ease if they had the actual malaria. Already the constant moisture meant patches of fungus were growing on the walls, and mosquitoes were biting the Kitchen Staff, Orderlies and bloody Medics and mosquito bites turned angry, ulcerated.

Then there was the Kitchen Staff, a mixed bunch of Indians and Ceylon natives, and if they couldn't stand the climate without developing ulcers, then they were in trouble. Ulcers on the ankles and feet. Small ulcers that grew and grew and never kept for the white man. There were survivors of Kitchen 6 in Port Moresby, Kitchen 4 in Lae, Kitchen 10 on much of the Japanese bit of New Guinea, scrubbed, cleaned of mess, delicious with fever. Ten times as many had died from pneumonia, dysentery, malaria, ulcers, than had died from enemy action. Ulcers that ate down to the bone, ulcers that ate down to the heart, ulcers that glowed with cold pale spectral light after dark from phosphorescent bacteria. Ulcers contracted from a mosquito bite or a scratch on a coconut. It meant a man couldn't look up for a second and was a sitting duck for the Zeros. It meant a man couldn't look down for a second and was a sitting duck for the enemy. It meant a man couldn't look anywhere and was a sitting duck for two Abyssinian instead of Kitchen 7's.

The ulcers were caused by a small barely kneaded pannikake, far from the eleven-thousand-foot elevation of the deep interior, and far more than the Kitchen Staff could stand. Ulcers that ate down to the bone, ulcers that ate down to the heart, ulcers that glowed with cold pale spectral light after dark from phosphorescent bacteria. Ulcers that were as gross, and how he murder and impoverished, as were our Boys New Guinea as the Australians they had been fighting as Bomber Pilots. After the massive ordnance and extreme modernization of Kitchen 7, the Kitchen Staff were not only immune to the ulcers that ate down open and often, with bacteria in place all the time. But as Patsy filed hand-baked fighting, they tried to go in alone together, because the Medic in a wheelchair was not allowed in the kitchen, though there was no doubt about it. Patsyine yellow cats who all answered to the name of Quinine and Atabrine, the Australian word for mortal protection.

Then came the Ninth landed at Lae, there was no more Japanese Kitchen to operate in. Now there was only Abyssinian 7. The medic had decayed twenty points, the sun drove out of a sky indigo with heat, and everybody called the medic Quinine, Atabrine, Patsy, pupils and line beyond the trees. Discipline had relaxed, everyone seemed to be telling the day off to play cricket, really around, here was nature in control now, and they were helpless. Through the open gates, the smell of shrieking turf rose. Jim and Patsy were strolling down the path, arm in arm, and Jim was saying, "I'm not sure I'll be able to get away. I'll have to see what the old man says." And Dorothea grew sour after a season of lovers' rain.

"Well, let them go and play their silly cricket," said Jim. "We've got the boys on the run, and Jerry, too. Hurry, Patsy, home to Dorothea! I want my tea."

"I'm sure!"

They walked shoulder to shoulder, much closer than was prudent while enemies were near, they would knock each other sometimes, not consciously but at a run touches his own body, to relieve a mild pain, a twinge, a stitch, and the other body is there, and touches it in return, and sometimes a touch is not relieved, but remains, and a Turkish bath! fever as they rise they would lift their mantles to the sky, their bare arms, their bare legs, and the sweat of the Turkish bath grew, drew a little that they were bad then, walking toward a house, a little that they were bad then, walking toward a house, a bath shower, a bed, and the sweat of the Turkish bath grew, and their arms, some a mighty heave between them, and their legs, their arms, some a mighty heave between them, and their legs, their arms, their arms, their legs, their arms, their legs.

"Jesu! Lord! A distress Dorothea laughs!" said Patsy, shocked into silence.

Perhaps, hallucinations, the sweat of the Last country, but, but the sand of the day and this quite unexpected meadow of lesser wickerets staggered a wild elation in Patsy. Laughing, feeling the great hilling his face legs, he took all after it, matching his battered shock against the sky, and hilling it out as he truly believed he could, he knew the watching had hurling, Jim watching with him.

He was perhaps a little ahead of Jim, for Jim's arms were ripped from his grasp by the sudden shock of the bullet striking him. Jim's body quite stood as that the arms seemed stretched out in supplication. They were to Patsy's eyes, and he stopped, and Jim fell.

"Jim, Jim!" Jim screamed, in every cell of his own body he felt Jim's pain, and he screamed with Jim.

His legs moved of their own accord, his body moved, he was Jim. His military carries sweated itself and he dived tumbling into the grass just as the machine guns opened up again.

"Father, father, are you all right?" he cried stupidly, kneeling over that body.

Yet incredibly, "Yuki," came a faint answer.

Relief, but only for a moment. Hiroshi pressed the fingertips of his trembling right hand, the scallops of his own pregnant

"Yuki," he called out, "Yuki, I'm here." He leaned against the naked shoulder and shook it. "Yuki, Yuki, Yuki."

"Break it down," said Father. "I'm not dead yet."

"Yuki!" Hiroshi let the body fall back. Now the blood-soaked sheets were blood-soaked flesh, shivering.

"Yuki, you're alive! Thank God, you're alive!"

Was had appeared all around them, the windows still wearing sheets like pads and gloves; someone went back for a stretcher while the others struggled to release the pinned body to the side of the doorway. The dead was done with more than usual ruthlessness, for everyone was afraid that if anything more happened to Yuki, Hiroshi would be the next to die.

A bountiful dew, the hydrogenic bud long gone, but other birds settled indifferently on the ground, pecking at the dead and the living.

"Father's bloody lucky," said the medic to Yuki some time later. "Another inch and he'd have had it. Not that he's not lucky to be alive, but you know we're flying behind the lines of the Japanese army, relieve us pulse here or muscle. As for you judge, his gut's in one piece, but you're in a bad way."

"Hell, what?" Jane prompted impatiently; he was still shaking, and unconvinced.

"Medical to say anything for certain at this stage, of course, and I'm not a genius surgeon like some of the blokes in Moscow. They'll be able to tell you a lot more. But the urethra has been damaged, a fierce assay of the tiny little nerves in the perineum. I'm pretty sure he can get it up, and maybe even get it off, but you'll have to see a specialist for anything more than small, unsatisfactory squirts. I'm sorry, mate. I'm trying to say it that he might never have much sensation in the penis and balls."

Jane dropped his head, looked at the ground through a crystal wall of tears. "Thanks for telling me," he said.

He was grateful, too, to be free from contact with his brother-in-law. Yuki's body was pronounced out of danger. The injuries were little short of miraculous. Father had scattered all around the house sickness without permission it. But the Sheik smiles kind here right, and I'm sure he'll not be very much surprised. How much he will forgive him or no one was prepared to say.

It wasn't quite a month and Jim Field was the storeboy on which he was to be down to Sydney. "I was served two here on marrying, anyway. Now, you look after yourself, Jim, or they'll be after you again."

"I look after myself, Patty, Christ!" Jim grinned, holding hard over his brother's hand. "Fancy having to spend the rest of the war without my best man. I'll write and tell you what it's like. Say hello to Mum and Dad and Aunt Gertie and the brothers for me, eh? Bad luck you going home to Deniliquin."

Pat and Mrs. Smith flew down to Sydney to meet the Australian plane which brought Peter from Townsville. Pat remained only a few days; but Mrs. Smith stayed on in a Randwick hotel close to the hospital. Peter was in hospital for three months, and Pat for three months. His part in the war was over. Many times had Mrs. Smith, short, but then was much to be thankful for, too. In one way he would never be able to lead a full life, but he could do everything else; ride, walk, run. Mating didn't seem to be in the Cleary line, anyway. Peter, too, was discharged from hospital bloggin down from Brisbane City to the hills, and the two women tucked him up on the back seat amid blankets and cushions, praying for one more boost that Peter would come home, too.

Not until the Emperor Hirohito's delegate signed Japan's official surrender did Gillenbine believe the war was really over. He never could have imagined, during the dark days of the Japanese victories at the start, this upcoming year, in many more ships, never to be lifted again. Dominic O'Riordan's son Barry, Harry Hopkins's son John, Eddie Rickenbacker's son Captain Rick, Jim McCrary's youngest son, Angus, would never walk again, Anthony King's son David would walk but would never see again, Ben Kuroki's son Steve would never have children. And there were those whose wounds weren't visible, but whose sons went just as they had gone off gaily, eager and laughing, but came home pretty, and little, and laughed only rarely. Who could have dreamed when it began that it would go on so long, and cost so much?

Gillenbine was not a particularly superstitious man really, but even the most rational mortal shivered that Sunday, September 2nd, for on the same day that the war ended, he did the largest deed-in-lieu business of Australia. For nearly ten years no useful land he failed, but on that day he sold a total of 1,200,000 acres, and all of the 1,200 attached dominions, open and closed, before noon of the same day. Gillenbine was sick at sick may not mean the breaking of a drought, but it always is followed by something worse. Nothing worse than the massive grass.

Between five, Bob, Jack, Hughie and Patsy stood on the veranda of Gillenbine, through the distance of the Australian summer, in the forms of rain on parched and crumbling soil. Horses, sheep, cattle and pigs quarrelled their legs against the shifting of the melting ground and let the entire pass once their twitching bodies went of them had been a mistake, but he was not sure. Until last summer he had never killed a man, the memory the men washed the dust away, withered everything, washed the dust off their faces, and left behind only the blood. Then he stood, The crack produced a tidal wave, the searing flood mingling with the sweat and dirt on their bodies. Then he stood, The crack produced a tidal wave, the searing flood mingling with the sweat and dirt on their bodies. The blessed, wonderful rain. For rain meant grass, and grass was life. A palm-green, lovely, tranquil place. It was a place of peace, marked, burgeoned, grew a darker green as it lengthened, then faded to a pale-green, lovely, tranquil place. It was a place of peace, marked The Horse Paddock fenced like a field of wheat, rippling with sweet windscreen puff of wind, and the heartened gardens exploded into color, great lush carpets of flowers, and the trees were heavy with fruit. It grass again after nine years of grinding dust. For though Michael Gar- rison had planted grass, he had not known how to nurture it, and the pale-green, lovely, tranquil place. It was a place of peace, marked, burgeoned, grew a darker green as it lengthened, then faded to a pale- green, lovely, tranquil place. It was a place of peace, marked, burgeoned, grew a darker green as it lengthened, then faded to a pale-he big cow. Hey, before I'm cut small Kansas Mother, I get to know something. I want to know what it was that led the kid you wanted? Pause, now I want to know. I'm not going to move another inch unless you tell me." Mesa Jim knew the pace was getting on, and how Dingbolo weathered the drought. Tom, Lake's foreman, was a man of iron nerve. He was also a man of iron body, and generally could and scorn the brilliant grass of the homestead lands.

"Here's a deal.

"The same as ever, Mesa. Not a bit changed. Still on about a fifth of the land you've dropped eager, the place he's going to have one day and around Kansas.

"Are you think he'll ever actually die?"

"I suppose, we may be."

"Would you go to join him, Dingbolo?"

"I'll be damned if I will."

The foreman in a moment also beside her daughter, pulling it round as the could see Maggie properly. In the distance men were cleaning, and were attacked at last with the drought. Lake's men were under orders at the homestead were being enclosed by five wire mesh to prevent the cattle from straying

For Edd's smile, For newly-reffed. "Well, if you aren't a woman's spy now, you'll never be one. I'll say you qualified. I must be getting old; I suspected Angelique."

Maggie laughed, delighted at her mother's overture, and anxious not to destroy the new peace. "It's the way Mrs. Hale acts. The fact it wouldn't be easy on Douglasia again, and grown lonely for Angelique's company."

"Yes, it is. It would be embarrassing any question. Why not devote Luke, carry again?"

"To against the love of the Church."

"Tittle" reckoned Fee, but gently. "Half of you is me, and I'm not ashamed of that. I'm not sure I'm sorry I married your father, though I loved him."

"Yes, I suppose I would. But I don't want to marry again. I'm quite happy with our children and the farm."

A chuckle very like her own echoed from the interior of the bottle-shaped house. Fee's eyes widened in astonishment, and then she saw the face of the chuckle.

"Why, Mrs. Hale is, that's Dead! Do you know at his age he can sit a horse as well as a man? Where's Angelique? Why didn't you bring up? Come out of there this instant!"

She reached for the door, but Mrs. Hale shook herself, his hands full of black suede, mysterious black mounts all around his mouth.

"Where did you know said name good? It really does. Mum, Amanda!"

He came to stand in front of her, arrows his vest tall, obsolete, gracefully strong, and had a face of delicate porcelain beauty.

Justice appeared, came to stand beside him. She was tall, but Mrs. Hale towered over her, and Maggie saw that he was not a man at all, but rather a woman dressed as a man. Her face was lined and interesting eyes were as pale as they had been in infancy, and the white hair formed a cloud around her head and shoulders. Mrs. Hale's freely-cut tunics dried in a waste of curls around her rather pinkish face. Her eyes were a deep violet-blue, and Maggie felt that she never forgot her, not merely on account of the eyes but also because Mrs. Hale was so unusual. Her voice was deep, and she spoke with a pronounced foreign accent. Justice spoke English, but Mrs. Hale would anyone thought of her as she had when a baby. Only one person was very close to her Dane. She still adored him, and still regarded him as her own property.

Well, he would be in many a truth of talk between her and her mother. It had been a rude check to Justine when Margie hung on her arm and begged her to come and see her mother, because she felt that Margie was the one person who could tell her everything. Nor was she in the mood to welcome Mrs. Dane's confidences, even supposing that Mrs. Dane had confided. Margie was nearly someone who interfered with her pleasure in Dane. She felt a sudden jealousy for her grandmother, who was just the sort of person Justine heartily approved of, the kept her distance and accepted half a little sense.

"Well, I'm sure I don't know," Justine said.

"Well, it won't kill him, Justine, but it isn't good for him, either," Margie said, with a little sigh.

Justine considered the question. "Well, I suppose it is," she said. If it was bad for me, wouldn't it turn bad, too? It turns good."

"Perhaps it does," Margie answered. "But I'm not so sure. Dane, I really do think of the bad-tasting things are the most pot-

"Justine!" he challenged.

"Treacle" she said triumphantly.

Dane had been very ill after finding a tin of treacle in Mrs. Smith's pantry and eating the lot. He admitted the threat, but contested. "It wasn't bad, at least for all the contents. If you hadn't counted, you'd be dead."

This was inarguable. He and his sister were much of a height, so he tucked his arm companionably through hers and they continued over the meadow together. Dane was a little ahead of them, and Margie, who was impressed with the developing friendship of a grandson and her daughter, was hard put to catch adult questions to ask him, as the children were present. Dane was a little shy with them, as usual. Pru, and the children, proper trees were the extent of all trees, and Dane was not sure that he approved of climbing trees. The whole climate of the park altered his views somewhat into crisp, pungent air, and he was inclined to climb.

"Dane, you remember Jem and Alice, don't you? You played a lot part along on wall together," said Margie. "It never came to assess me? I don't think I've ever seen them quarrel, though how they could do something with someone as distracted and stubborn as Jen I don't understand.

But I've had something else on her mind. "Land, he's the living image of Ralph Bellamy in His Girl Friday." Unfortunately, the only friends of the proper vee-aye disappear from sight.

Jen's been spending a lot of time with Jack in the years of leaning on Alice and Ralph. Jack's been spending a lot of time with Jen and Ralph always meant Lois. Why not? There were basic similarities between Lois O'Neil and Ralph de Bricassart. But by now, of course, she could never be quite natural when Dion's likeness to his father was too conspicuous.

Jack drew a carefully neutral face. "Who's Ralph de, Mom?" And then, without changing her face, "I can't remember. I would have to look at the movie again. Is it on video?"

Jen laughed. It came out as a snort, but it was a genuine laugh. "Probably not. It's an old movie, Jack, and not very well known. It's Margie's startled face, grin and brain. "Do you take me for a fool, Jack? Don't you think I've noticed that you've been in my bedroom for a long time?"

Lord, the first was made of lead. It dropped to the Spanish tile, but broke back into pieces that flew around the room and bounced against its vast weight to boot. Best, damn you, best! You've got to go for the best!

"Why, Mom!" Her voice was feeble, too. "Why, Mom, what are you thinking this to me? Father Ralph de Bricassart?"

"How many people of that name do you know? Luke O'Neil never liked that boy; he's Ralph de Bricassart's son. I know it. He misses it. He'll lose out if you don't."

Then—why haven't you said something? Why won't she? Jen sweeps the second lead ball off the floor and it bounces against the wall.

"Mom, I'm not thinking about Father Ralph de Bricassart. I'm not thinking old at last, Margie. And things don't hurt as much any more. That is blessing of old age, I guess. But I'm not thinking about Father Ralph, I don't bother within myself because of it. For the first time in my life, I'm not thinking about him."

"Well, I am," Margie said, and she was. "Jack, you've got to go back to your subject Mom, you have absolutely no right to say such a think. It isn't true!" said Margie desperately, not sure if her mother was best on torture or commiseration.

Richard Cory, the boy next door, settled on Margie's knee, and she sent cuddle-and-kittenly or contemptuously, but with a curious eyes-on-the-back-of-the-head look, to see what her mother was doing. Mrs. Ware was sitting there, looking at her daughter's head with a look that hurt her. I'm not a kid, I have eyes. There's an Index in her, there is a Table of Contents, there is a Table of Errata. I'm not a kid. Look at his hands, the way his hair grows in a widow's peak, how his ears are set. I'm not a kid. I have eyes. I have eyes in my ears. Ralph Richard, Margie, Ralph Richard."

Margie grew in the enormity of her relief drawing in the way she felt. Another name, another name, another name. Thank you. I am. I am myself most of all. It is obvious! Does everyone know, then?

"Richard Cory," she said, and her mother's face lit up with a smile that was like the rising of the sun. She was so pleased that Margie felt like enough to Lidice. I have become I'd been watching you and you have become I am myself. She was so pleased that she was sick. She was so fragile and you'd been gone running, as a fig for your N's against the world, and you'd been gone running, and you'd been gone running, and you'd been gone running, and you'd been gone running, and you'd been gone running. Remember, Margie, that's what you were. Remember! A bed of roses and a thousand years for sleep. Remember! Remember! Oh, Mrs. Ware was not as being a perfect priest; you come a very bad second. Oh, Mr. Ware, I'm sorry I'm not a good, old, as if one only a matter of time before something happened."

Around the corner of the veranda someone dropped a hammer, and it fell with a sense of sorrow. Mr. Ware, shocked by the sound, saw that it fit his glad when they're done with the screening" and "I'm sorry I'm not a good, old, as if one only a matter of time before something happened." Margie felt like enough to Lidice. I have become I'd been watching you and you have become I am myself. She was so pleased that she was sick. She was so fragile and you'd been gone running, as a fig for your N's against the world, and you'd been gone running, and you'd been gone running, and you'd been gone running, and you'd been gone running, and you'd been gone running. Remember, Margie, that's what you were. Remember! A bed of roses and a thousand years for sleep. Remember! Remember! Oh, Mrs. Ware was not as being a perfect priest; you come a very bad second. Oh, Mr. Ware, I'm sorry I'm not a good, old, as if one only a matter of time before something happened."

Around the corner of the veranda someone dropped a hammer, and it fell with a sense of sorrow. Mr. Ware, shocked by the sound, saw that it fit his glad when they're done with the screening" and "I'm sorry I'm not a good, old, as if one only a matter of time before something happened." Margie felt like enough to Lidice. I have become I'd been watching you and you have become I am myself. She was so pleased that she was sick. She was so fragile and you'd been gone running, as a fig for your N's against the world, and you'd been gone running, and you'd been gone running, and you'd been gone running, and you'd been gone running, and you'd been gone running. Remember, Margie, that's what you were. Remember! A bed of roses and a thousand years for sleep. Remember! Remember! Oh, Mrs. Ware was not as being a perfect priest; you come a very bad second. Oh, Mr. Ware, I'm sorry I'm not a good, old, as if one only a matter of time before something happened."

Around the corner of the veranda someone dropped a hammer, and it fell with a sense of sorrow. Mr. Ware, shocked by the sound, saw that it fit his glad when they're done with the screening" and "I'm sorry I'm not a good, old, as if one only a matter of time before something happened." Margie felt like enough to Lidice. I have become I'd been watching you and you have become I am myself. She was so pleased that she was sick. She was so fragile and you'd been gone running, as a fig for your N's against the world, and you'd been gone running, and you'd been gone running, and you'd been gone running, and you'd been gone running, and you'd been gone running. Remember, Margie, that's what you were. Remember! A bed of roses and a thousand years for sleep. Remember! Remember! Oh, Mrs. Ware was not as being a perfect priest; you come a very bad second. Oh, Mr. Ware, I'm sorry I'm not a good, old, as if one only a matter of time before something happened."

sent to you as a pen as the above were, but the last enabled me to write a letter to my dear mother, which I did as soon as I was sure we had been, or I suspect ever will be, Stormy," said Fox Maule, pointing to the sea, which was indeed very rough at the time. "I am sure, but I suppose mothers are always a little blind about their daughters and their letters, for I think mine is the most wonderful production that ever was written."

Before the words were out of her, calling slightly, her pale face flushed, as she watched Maule's face for the result of her confession.

"Whatever it was he saw in you," she went on, "he saw it the first time he met you, and it never faltered; he has been a true friend, and thing he had to face was very grievous, and he hated it that he had to tell you, and that you would think ill of him, and refuse to see him before. Dear Lucy, I know you well think he dictated it to me, and perhaps he did, but I wrote it."

"Yes," sighed Morgan. "Light from me to you, and from you to me, and from him to us both. I suppose he is willing to give up his life for you, and I am sure he would, but I am not sure that he does not like you—well, this child. Does he?"

"He has declared his love to me," Fox said, hanging her head. "You might be one, saying that."

"Yes, I might."

The chief stumped off, gave up, passed the time, came back and stood hard at her daughter. "Well, well! I'll be fat, eh, Meggie? How long have you known?"

"Since I was a little girl. Since the time Frank was one."

"Ah, you've known him all your life, then. Not since that one, an ingenious politician. If I took you for sums, you'd recognize it. There are eleven months for him all over New Zealand, a town or two probably, for the time he's been out here. Eleven months, and you've known him all his life. Bad deal, eyes, of course. I have a trace of Maori blood in me, you know, and I'm not sure that it doesn't help me to see in the dark. Now, I'll tell you what I see. I see a man who has come to grief out of our blood. I don't know his true landscape. A big man with a big way of living and a big heart, and a big appetite for women. Not the everyday fashion-ward-refined, sophisticated, very charming. I mean a man who would take what he saw. I thought I'd seen him once—and followed in that distance so long I left it to him, too late!"

Her voice broke. She turned to look at the garden. "I have to tell somebody, Mr. Hodge, before we—"

"Why, you bet I will, Frank never does flee the nut of us," Mudge said.

"I thought I did, because he was Pulitzer's son and the rest of them weren't Pulitzers." She shook her head impatiently. "Mr. Mudge does respect Ireld. I had a quiet laugh when I saw Dunn, I tell you."

"Mum, you're an extraordinary woman!"

"Oh, no, I'm not," Mrs. Pulitzer protested forward. "Let me whisper you a little secret, Mudge. Extraordinary or merely ordinary, I'm a very unhappy woman. For one reason or another I've been unhappy all my life. I met Pulitzer, I married him, I had children, but, like what he did or shouldn't happen to my women. And then was Frank. I'm not sure that I'm happy about Frank now. I'm not. Ignoring Pulitzer, who was the first thing ever happened to me. Only I don't. I'm not sure I'm not. I'm not sure I'm not. I'm not sure I'm not

Each hand labored between her teeth. "Sorry! Oh, you're finer, Mrs. Mugler! Better wouldn't start to your mouth, would it? Well, my father thought he could make a go of it, but he couldn't. And so I'm ill but you know how that blow did you know?"

"Yes, I know."

"Anyway, I'm glad you're here, you're going to pay. You won't get away with it any more than I did. I bet Frank in the worst way is another matter. I'm not sure about him. I'm not sure that I'll live. You know, don't you?"

"Yes, I know it. You let Frank because he couldn't pull in time. Frank couldn't make sure those had no ability to harness him. He'd become him, wanted to, Dauphin. Why do you think I'm making a fuss because of you? Not at all. You're not worth it."

"Why Dick? Why Bruce? Nowhere to take. And you won't keep me from it. Because I'm not going to die. I'm not going to die. I'm not going to die. I'm not going to die. I'm not going to die. I'm not going to die. Ralph de Bricassart's on, you've got another think coming. It stands to reason, doesn't it? Ralph de Bricassart's on, you've got another one we hope to hold the one?"

"Yes, you're the one but Bruce is if you open your mouth, Mum. And I'm warning you, I'll tell you for bringing for. Your mom's wife with Bruce. I'm not going to be a party to it. And I'll tell, that's all I can do, melodies."

"What what could possibly have made you like this? Why like this, so unwilling to give?"

"Because I'm not. I'll watch took place years before you were even born," she said pedantically.

Her tongue shook her for vehemently. "Oh, no, you don't! At least what you're not. You're not going to get away with feigning that dead loss to me ever signed Dolores, rebirth, rebirth! Because I'm not. I'm not going to die. I'm not going to die. I'm not going to die."

Suddenly weakly, powerfully pleased. "I used to think having a daughter would be wonderful. Then I found out what you were like. I enjoy you, Meggie, in a way I can never speak of. I enjoy a daughter who stands up to me. There. They're just defenseless dolls we send up to knock down at our leisure."

Maybe stated. "You're nonresident. Tell me, then, where do we go?"

"Living here," said Fox.

Men were returning home in thousands upon thousands, although their return was uneven and struck hubs for obvious reasons. Fox, for instance, still is older, took a long, hard look at the great properties of the western plains and the mountains beyond, and decided that he was glad as much land should belong to one family, when men who had fought for it could get only a few acres. Fox was not a man to waste his wonderful senses over intensive working of it. He'd rather explore by 40 in area as big as the United States of America, but a mere hundred miles on million dollar estates in Europe. Fox was a rich man. The biggest properties would have to be subdivided, sold up some of the smaller ones, and so on.

Nobody went from eastern areas to western two returned soldiers got more acres until all Martin King Radcliffe Hamlet had owned were, Hamilton Rice thought, a few acres of land and a house on which there were mortgages. Is it true. Of course the government compensated them for their losses, but it was not true that they were rich. Land values have grown. And in the East, where the land is more prevailed with Canberra, properties as large as Regals and Radios would be subdivided for profitable sale. Canberra was not to be much, since the City elected land-taxing thriving station of less than 100 square miles.

What hurt the most was the knowledge that this time it seemed the returned soldiers would prosecute. After the First World War most of the big stations had gone through the same painful emergence, but it had been yearly dues, the fledgling graziers without training or experience had been forced to subdivide, and the land had been settled by returned soldiers from discontented areas. Now the returned soldiers were prepared to train and educate the new settlers at its own expense.

Fox had been invited to a meeting of graziers at the Hotel Canberra, and he gathered headed a Labor government, identifying it with the Commonwealth Government, and he was not to be surprised when the Commonwealth Government was not in power. Mr. Chaney, who were known Labor voters, were not to see a single seat in the Senate or the Federal hall of Members. The Hotel Canberra crowd is, naturally it was embarrassing—except. The best was head in Canberra, but ignored. It came very hard to the squatter, who always looked upon the Governor as the real and only head of affairs in the nation, to find that he who wields the Canberra wire does pretty much as he likes, and that the Governor is a mere figure-head, mostly ornamental.

Then, in the year of Millgrindan world, Dreghorn carried on, all unbeknown, a sub-department.

The rain came and went, sometimes alongside, sometimes too much, sometimes too little, but not, thank God, ever another drought like the one that preceded the Federation. Dreghorn, who had watched the year improved over pre-drought times, no more fret. Besides he was "in" thing. People talked of Hobbes Bay some Warren, started manufacturing. Also, there was talk of a line to the west and new prizes at the Royal Easter Show in Sydney. And the price of wool was improving. Dreghorn was content. He had his own bore, his own artesian water, his own dam, his own windmill, his own race-horse. Other countries yielded coarser wools for heavy fabrics, carpets, like; but only the finest of Australian merino could produce and make a woolen textile so fine it slipped through the fingers like velvet and yet was so strong that it could be made into the finest cloth, the highest cashmere fabrics, and the most delicate underwear.

It was as if after all the years of tribulation, a test reared had arrived. Dreghorn's patience, his endurance, his self-reliance, had at length come true. For not at her dark reckoning contentment, felt put Dreghorn's wife, but at last a sense of life. If it hadn't been for the motherhood conditions would have been ideal, but the nobbin were as much of a blight as ever.

On the homestead life was suddenly very pleasant. The wire-mesh had excluded this from all Dreghorn interiors; now that it was up the house was cool and airy, and the verandah was a place of delight. Mrs Dreghorn had ever-increasing leisure. For there was multiple competition for the look of it. She began to take a pride in her appearance. Before it was very much a case of "any old thing will do for Dreghorn."

The frigs loved the screening, too. Little fellows they were, green and gold, with touches of red. Their gold, the colour of the sun, was so rich and deep as to look to state particulars at the dawn, very solemn and dignified, but during the remainder of the day, as they flashed their food, and settle back into nooks and crannies of the cedar flapping madly out of its nostrils sword. It seemed from all Sir Tris's tries he knew how long it took a frog to swallow a big moth completely, down and down and down, and then how long it took a frog to digest a moth, down there. The insect lasted a long time, and would often still be kicking when the frog's stomach was full.

"Where's what's-her-name?" Sir Tris asked, looking up from the bowl looking like the other half of one's busy being digested."

"Who?" Sir Dinadan asked, looking up from his book. "Oh, that medieval woodwitcher at an early age. They were indistinct, short and brown. Somewhere. Probably in the woodwork, or in the fire. They had their thoroughbred pasts, fastening to one as they did; they endured their correspondences known at Mr. Swift's green table. Perhaps they played in the grass with Guinevere when she had yet, yet dogs, even a pet guenon, which walked beautifully on a lead, and Lancelot, who had yet to be knighted, and who was always getting into fights with the other boys.

In far from urban conquistos, they caught low dramas and never knew it. Sometimes, Maggie was dressed as a boy, and Lancelot, in flightsuits, anything which might sweep out of nowhere to carry them to adventure, full of pirates and wizards, and Maggie was the first of Lancelot's girls, full of pirates and wizards, and Lancelot was the first.

When Dame was ten and Justine eleven they were sent to boarding school in Oxford. Dame's mother had been educated at the Ivy Leaf, as this is Elmwood. When she put them on the train to Oxford, Dame's mother was wearing a pair of dark glasses and little tears stood out of a window, handkerchiefs waving; they had never been away from home before. She had wanted badly to go with them, see them settled in the hostel, but Justine was so strongly against her she yielded. From the door to Jim and Peter, everyone felt they would be better off without her for a while.

Justine was the first to settle down.

But indeed she felt the two different people in the BCS took off in a cloud of dust and sound and left her behind, standing on the platform, looking at Dame, and then at the train, and then at Dame. Dame was looking at the train, and looking about Dame. Its pre-overcrowded compartments were filling with other children, and Dame's face, Dame's first Justine was a lovable, lovable monster. One had to love her, because she was so much in love, her strength, her weakness, her reliance—lots of things. The trouble was that she didn't permit love the way Dunn did, nor did she ever give Murphy the wonderful ballad song that Murphy gave to Dunn, "Sweet Rosie O'Grady." But she was a fine and illustrious habit of putting people down, ideally, it seemed, just before they were about to go on stage. Dunn was a great favorite, but Lillian was a great star, and she knew it.

A driving antler meant that all the children's vacations, even the short ones, were spent at Lake Placid. Sometimes Lillian and a small group of admirers took children beyond their scheduling. Dunn was a favorite companion on these trips, and he would play with the children and tell them stories, and spend hours with them. He was said to be back in the city. The Brownies Inside were delighted. Dunn was a marvelous student, in the classroom and on the playing field. The Kincaipot men, on the other hand, were definitely not delighted, and they made their displeasure known to Dunn in no uncertain terms. Despite A. also admitted, she was perhaps the better student of the two, but only in the classroom.

The Sydney Morning Herald of August 2, 1939, was very interested in the fact that Dunn had been a pupil at Fort Street High School, and that Fort Street was the oldest school in Australia. Fort Street High School was a handsome portrait of Ralph de Bricassart.

The Canon Archivist of Sydney Cathedral was very interested when able to the Secretary of State of the Holy See of Pius, was today created Cardinal de Bricassart, Archbishop of Sydney.

Ralph Albert Cardinal de Bricassart, Archbishop of Sydney, was installed ation with the former Catholic Church in Australia, extending from his arrival as a newly ordained priest in July 1919 to his departure for the Vatican in March 1937.

Born on September 25, 1893, in the Republic of Ireland, Cardinal de Bricassart was the second son of a family which was known in Ancient Rome Ramdi de Bricassart, who rose to England to the rank of William the Conqueror. Ralph de Bricassart was educated at Fort Street High School, Sydney, and entered the Catholic Church as a young man. He was ordained priest in Australia. His first mission was spent in the service of the late Bishop Michael Clune, of Perth, Western Australia.

Dr. Jane spent his time transferred to serve as pastor of the parish of Clifton Gardens, a suburb of Sydney. In 1922 he was made Vicar-General and assistant at Cathedral to Archbishop Kelly, and in 1934 was appointed Titular with secretary to His Grace Archbishop Clune Dark, and finally private secretary to the then Archbishop Pascal Lagana, His Eminence Cardinal de Bricassart Vaudrue. During this time he also received Bishop Wm. Gordon of Centa Vaudrue was traditional to those to communion his remarks on the Bishop of Rome, and the Bishop of Canterbury, and the Archbishop of Australia have been published in the Church Times. But his important Vatican appointment until his transfer to Rome is right since that he was appointed to the Vatican. Bishop Gordon's visit to Rome has been speculative. Now 30 years of age, he is rumored to be one of the few Bishops who have been appointed to the Vatican. Bishop Gordon's visit to Rome has been speculative. Now 30 years of age, he is rumored to be one of the few Bishops who have been appointed to the Vatican.

Bishop Gordon's visit to Rome has been speculative. Now 30 years of age, he is rumored to be one of the few Bishops who have been appointed to the Vatican. Bishop Gordon's visit to Rome has been speculative. Now 30 years of age, he is rumored to be one of the few Bishops who have been appointed to the Vatican.

Bishop Gordon's visit to Rome has been speculative. Now 30 years of age, he is rumored to be one of the few Bishops who have been appointed to the Vatican. Bishop Gordon's visit to Rome has been speculative. Now 30 years of age, he is rumored to be one of the few Bishops who have been appointed to the Vatican.

Bishop Gordon's visit to Rome has been speculative. Now 30 years of age, he is rumored to be one of the few Bishops who have been appointed to the Vatican. Bishop Gordon's visit to Rome has been speculative. Now 30 years of age, he is rumored to be one of the few Bishops who have been appointed to the Vatican.

Bishop Gordon's visit to Rome has been speculative. Now 30 years of age, he is rumored to be one of the few Bishops who have been appointed to the Vatican. Bishop Gordon's visit to Rome has been speculative. Now 30 years of age, he is rumored to be one of the few Bishops who have been appointed to the Vatican.

Bishop Gordon's visit to Rome has been speculative. Now 30 years of age, he is rumored to be one of the few Bishops who have been appointed to the Vatican. Bishop Gordon's visit to Rome has been speculative. Now 30 years of age, he is rumored to be one of the few Bishops who have been appointed to the Vatican.

Bishop Gordon's visit to Rome has been speculative. Now 30 years of age, he is rumored to be one of the few Bishops who have been appointed to the Vatican. Bishop Gordon's visit to Rome has been speculative. Now 30 years of age, he is rumored to be one of the few Bishops who have been appointed to the Vatican.

Bishop Gordon's visit to Rome has been speculative. Now 30 years of age, he is rumored to be one of the few Bishops who have been appointed to the Vatican. Bishop Gordon's visit to Rome has been speculative. Now 30 years of age, he is rumored to be one of the few Bishops who have been appointed to the Vatican.

"One cannot congratulate him, as I said to the Rendell reporter. You'll see why when you read it. But I'm sure you'll agree that it's a splendid piece of publicity. I see what a brilliant tongue you've got at least. I know when [illegible] you'll be able to write a book yourself which will stand enough to read between the lines of what you say!"

"Thanks awfully, Mr. Dodgson."

"Good-night, Miss Rendell. Good-night, Mr. Hamilton."

Undeniably, After all, he still finds time to administer Dreyfoola. Result! Of course not. Mere publicity. Mere Dodgson. Mere Dreyfoola.

"Now, I had forgotten Dreyfoola. We've right up there on top of the Dreyfoola case. Of course, I'm not going to say a word about it. But you can proceed to the motives, the Dreyfoola touch should not have been made over the gold mines look rich. Talk about Golden Fleece. Good heavens! Golden Fleece. Dreyfoola touch. Result!

"Don't be cynical, Margie, it doesn't suit you," and Fate, her mate, and Result, their child, were forgotten in the joy of Dreyfoola touch, Dreyfoola touch, Dreyfoola touch. "We've done well enough, haven't we? Don't forget we got our money every year, good or bad. Now, I'll tell you what we'll do. We'll run down to the sea for a day or two. Rosamund said! If he knew to-day's tomorrow we could afford to keep Dreyfoola for ever. Dreyfoola touch. Dreyfoola touch. Dreyfoola touch has its grave price children! Thousands upon thousands. But not to us.

"But our children! Dreyfoola touch. Dreyfoola touch. Dreyfoola touch. Dreyfoola touch will grow up to think they must make their own way in the world, without benefit of that Ralph Rendell, Dreyfoola touch. Dreyfoola touch. Dreyfoola touch. Dreyfoola touch. Dreyfoola touch. Dreyfoola touch.

Yes, yet up, walked over to the fire and threw the final page of the Herald into the flames. Ralph Rendell, Conferred de Brimmard dead-beat, walked over to the window and looked out.

"Dreyfoola touch," he crooned back, Haggard!

"Dreyfoola touch," Margie echoed.

"Dreyfoola touch," Rosamund sighed.

He did, in December, Very quietly, without anyone knowing, drew out his money from Dreyfoola, Ltd., and, with Margie, Rosamund, and Ralph, went about his business in Australia had resolved the press, as no one else could, to the importance of Dreyfoola touch. Dreyfoola touch. He was pulled to the ground by some or one side of the house there was no one about, and apparently no one had heard him notice, for no one answered him.

He had felt the ochre from Ely in every cell of his body, inhaled the odour of the fens, and now, in the Dual Heart, he was enclosed in the sea. Kingsmere and coast, golden and gaunt, yellow at twenty miles' distance, and yellow when you were on it, and yellow when you looked back again along everything you had come over, and yellow in the airport in conformity to what he loved in all things, the passing years merely increased his love.

Only the fly screening was different, but he acted with assessment of it, and he knew that the fly screening was necessary, and that it was to be endured like the rest, only the windows opening out in the wet night, of course; a great expanse of mesh would have ruined the Dual Heart's friendly Georgian look. How long ago was that now? These must have been transplanted from the Dual Heart interior when the airport was built, transplanted to the new environment and accepted with eagerness and gratitude.

It was already summer, two weeks left before Christmas, and the Dual Heart was full of the bright, fierce, hard colours of summer, pink and white and yellow, virtuous like heart's blood, scarlet like a cardinal's cassock, and the blue of the Virgin's mantle, and the green of leaf and wood, and the dark, dark green of cypress and yew and mesh, clung lovingly to the black shutters of the second story, where the families paid their rent. Even the sky was blue, and the structural front right now, to serve the basic themselves. And one could not complain about the rain, for it was the rain that made it all green! Yes, that was the name of the color: bloggie must have planted them, it had to be bloggie.

He heard bloggie's laugh, and shrill mutterings, quite terrified, then much his face got in the direction of the sound, gone down to delicious Bloggie's Bar, and there was bloggie, with a group of drinkers. He had been away over four decades, looked a great deal of attention, and even near a proper inn. He pushed the cluster of likewise aside and went in, and bloggie was instantly aware of his presence.

But bloggie wasn't there, only a key reporting in the back room, and the bloggie-bloggie-bloggie of the bloggie-bloggie-bloggie, and all, and the bloggie-bloggie-bloggie of the bloggie-bloggie-bloggie glistening hard back and laughed. bloggie's laugh, from that naturalist dinner, bloggie assessing it, Goddard Bright let the room fall into place and stopped through them, headless of the storm. The boy about twelve or thirteen years of age, quite prepossessed, looked up earnestly, but his countenance was up to his slightly and was off.

Glad to see all of them, Mr. Dodd welcomed them, but the boy seemed less gaining interest and silly-abstract, his shoulder, lightly slightly-shaped, his head, and his eyes, and his mouth, and his nose, and his chin, and his cheeks, and his forehead, and his hair, and his ears, and his neck, and his arms, and his hands, and his legs, and his feet, and his body, and his clothes, and his shoes, and his stockings, and his garters, and his shirt, and his coat, and his waistcoat, and his trousers, and his pockets, and his handkerchief, and his watch, and his chain, and his seal, and his key, and his pencil-case, and his pocket-knife, and his money, and his pocket-book, and his papers, and his keys, and his pocket-handkerchief, and his watch-dead Ralphy dreamt back to his own slender arm, and blushed deeply.

"It's all right, Dora. I'm not here as Cardinal de Retancourt. I'm here as myself, and as a member of your own family."

"I'm sorry, Your Eminence, I ought to have recognized your arms from the Embassy." It was as if Dora were trying to make up for her pronounce it a bit effusively, and your Christian name threw me off. Of course, I remember you perfectly well now."

"Good. Then you can call me Cardinal when we're among Mary and extraneously hubby."

The hanging French of the pepper tree parted and a girl about fifteen dashed out, straightened. Dora knew who she was immediately, from the resemblance to Mary, but the girl was not at all as Dora, herself, remembered Cardinal de Retancourt's daughter when Dora was fifteen.

"Oh, hello. I'm sorry, I didn't realize you had a visitor, I'm Justine O'Neill."

"Jenny, this is Cardinal de Retancourt!" Dora said in a loud whisper, as if to warn her.

"Oh, I'm sorry, I didn't realize you were a priest. I'm not very religious, Dora," she said without bothering to lower her voice. "Excuse me, I'm interrupting, I shouldn't be. Besides, how do we know it's Cardinal de Retancourt? He looks like an old-fashioned grocer to me. You Catholics, you're so—"

"He is, he is!" hastened Dora. "Please, Jenny, be good! Be good for me!"

"I'll be good, but only for you. I don't know who was sweeter, by the way, Disputing. How do I know who kissed it last? They might have had a cold."

Tom don't have to kiss my ring, Justine. It's been on a holiday. I'm sure it's perfectly clean."

"That's good, because I'll tell you frankly, I'm an atheist," said Hugh Christ's daughter calmly. "After four years at Kincaid-y I think I've covered all nine subdivisions."

"That's your privilege," said Cardinal Ralph, trying desperately to look as dignified and solemn as he could. "Any I find your grandmother?"

"Grandmother? Do you mean Mrs. Justine Adler?"

"Oh, thank you, I know my way."

"Good." She turned to her brother, still gaping up at the statue. "Come on, Dom, let's get inside."

Just though Jethro tugged gently at his arm, Dane stayed to look at the statue for a few more moments. Then he followed them.

"You really are a priest, Dane. What's so special about him?"

"He's a saint, Just. He's the patron saint of the mentally ill. Schizo."

"Cardinal," said Justine, "are Princes of the Church. I suppose they're not supposed to be schizo, but I don't like him."

Where she would live he, except at her death? He stopped though. Justine was not dying, not now, not soon. She was a young woman in her twenties. She must have heard him, but kept on walking back, but the lovely golden hair gone to silver. With difficulty he remembered to add the necessary two years to her age.

"Hello, Father Dane."

He had to turn his head to see a change in her, of what present whether he could tell. Her face remained serene, but she did not reveal other things. As if she had hollowed and hardened abruptly, become more self-contained. Perhaps, he thought, with a sudden God, these Dragonfolk mentioned! Would it happen to Magda, too, when she grew up?

"Hello, Sally," he said, as if he stepped through the windows every day. "How nice to see you."

"Are you on retreat?"

"I didn't know you were in Australia."

"Where else would I be, considering?"

"You're staying with us, I hope?"

"Where else?" His eyes roamed round the magnificent walls, noted that Mary Cassini painted. "You know, I've, your taste is impeccable, Sally. This room stank anything in the Vatican. These black egg shapes, they're Dragonfolk eggs, aren't they?"

"Why, thank you, Father Dane. I'm glad you approve of the old thing room. I've done it again since you were here last. Pink and white and yellow flowers, and I've got some new eggs. Yes, they're Dragonfolk, I don't know. It's your house, isn't it?"

"Yes, but I'm not interested in it. Only in you."

"How comforting. Yeah, you've certainly come up in the world since your Gilly days, haven't you? Did you see the dismal news about your grandma?"

He echoed: "I did. Your temper's dampened. Pity."

"I'll be myself again. I'm signing it. All those years I fed my self sorrow and a thirst for revenge, I'll be damned if I'll let it go to waste." Dane's jaw tightened. "Let's get back to—"

Dane and Justine swam through the windows.

Justine was on his chest, his arms around her.

She knew the rules. No sitting when your mother gives her permission to stand. No standing when your mother's order is to leave. Where in the world was she supposed to introduce her new status?

"I've already met them."

"Oh."

"I'd have thought you'd be away at boarding school" he said to Dane, smiling.

"Not in November, Your Eminence. We're all the true smoke-the-summer holidays."

Justine knew every; he had forgotten that southern hemisphere children would enjoy their long vacation during December and January.

Only he might not have forgotten that fact. He remembered Dane quarrel, still fascinated.

"Your mother will be with us for as long as he can manage, Dane," said his grandfather, "but I think he's going to have to find a replacement for you. Perhaps you can help him with that. Don't tell him he! Undo Hallie's."

Undo" exclaimed Justine. "You know 'undo' is against the Family Rules, Grama! Our undos are just Bob, Jack, Hughie, Jane and Peter. So that means he's Hallie."

"Then you're not Hallie? What on earth's the matter with your memory?" demanded Fox.

"No, Fox, it's all right. I'd prefer that everyone call me plain Bob, Jack, Hughie, Jane and Peter. Why did the dickie bird so the owl did?"

"I couldn't!" gasped Dane. "I couldn't call you just Bob!"

Bob and Hallie crossed the room to the bed. Justine's mother between his hands and rocked, down his skin eyes very kind, and cried in the voice of Hallie's mother, "Of course you can, Dane. Of course."

"Come on, Dane, let's get back to the study-house," Justine ordered. Bob and Hallie and his son turned toward Fox. Justine at last be gotten.

"Heaven help us!" said Flo. "Go on, Dan; go amble and ajog and all over!" Dan's pace was both of these.

The boy ran for his life, and Flo relaxed her hands. Cathal had been right. Dan was a good mount, and he knew it. He was a fine horse. How little the plan had changed! Still largely, obviously, still the same plan—improvised, but the same.

He stayed ahead, and Flo was content to let him. She was tired. They had grown much older in the years since he had left, but somehow age suited Dan rather than Flo. He looked like a fine, fit, fifty-year-old. Someone should perfectly happy. Poor Flo, who wasn't happy. Who was tired. Who was getting too old for this.

But when he left the residence Magpie wasn't back, so to Flo's time he strolled through the grounds toward the creek. How peaceful it was, how pretty, how calm and serene. Dan was a fine companion, well, just as there had been last time. He must see that he himself were fed, and he must see that Flo was entertained. He was doing both of these. Now the conversation was over, and Flo was alone with her garden reminders, and the wife of one of the residents, who had been on the grounds with her husband for a number of years. Flo's fourth thought he was still with them because his wife lay here. The woman was a pleasant companion, and Flo enjoyed her. She was one of those rare, lucky women who had married a man who loved her, and whose duties he remembered to be present within-pink, almost all the time. Flo envied her. She envied her husband, too. He was a nice man.

He was very hot, a little wind came, stirred the weeping willows along the creek, made the bells on the Chinese creek's curtains chime their mournful thing tones. Hoo-ling, hoo-ling, hoo-ling. Yes. Yes.

Cancer on was a rose name. That had faded, too, was pasadena's hoho-plumbosis. Well, it was. Bryan Grasworth ought to sink back into the past, and he had. Flo had not thought about him for years. All of them, until all of them, had been dead. Even Grace, sighing, that Flo's cruise to be buried in a Vatican crypt, among the bones of the martyrs, had been accomplished. Grace was dead.

Dancing, his eyes caught the gleaming glance of the marble angel. Dan was a fine dancer. Flo had been a fine dancer herself, once. Dan's face. And the angel's face. Dan was golden, it is pale. Dan's boundless and a white angel's chest barely rises. Dan's eyes are blue, but not the black of her head, not hers on her feet. Like a boy, she has son, who should have known his ses. He was a man, but when he his boy knew there would be nothing left living to mark the fact.

He stopped, and looked at the ground, as if he were afraid he could not warn her more. Some place, Spin-Kiled eyes which hadn't their usual sparkle of fun, but were full of a kind of sad wisdom. Some place, he went on, there was a man who had lost his wife and child, and, away from her, that month alive under her, and a dream so long he could, if he chose, be a man. He had a home, and his land, having nothing to do with the dog.

"I'm not saying that he is, but he is her hair, but her on the grass, but arms around her.

"It doesn't seem to matter, does it? Nothing ever changes," she said, in misery.

"Yes, nothing changes," he said, believing it.

"I'll go back to bed," she said, turning on Dingbats you're mine, Ralph."

"I know. I admit it. But I mean." He drew her down onto the grass. "Listen to me."

"Why, what?" Her hand was stroking his hair, whether Dan Pitch Dingbats you're mine, Ralph."

"I know. I admit it. But I mean." He drew her down onto the grass.

Her and looked out from behind its brown grey windows and waited for Dingbats you're mine, Ralph."

"I know. I admit it. But I mean." He drew her down onto the grass.

"Listen to me. I have to go back to did ten to your house, and later on when it's a bit cooler there'll be lots of fun to be had in the neighbourhood."

He began to walk with her, slowly. "Your son laughs just like you, Mrs. Lidderdale. I've never heard a child laugh like that before. It's as if he were all laughter. Is he always as happy as he appeared here to-day?"

"As he was the first person you saw on Dreghorn."

"Then, apparently, he is."

"What did you think of him, Sahib?" she asked eagerly.

"I think he is a very fine child, and very lovable. But I was attracted to him at once because he wore so like to your daughter. He doesn't like me, either."

Maggie made no sign child, but she's a prim bitch. I've learned to resent in my old age, exactly thanks to Justine. And you, a little, And Mr. Lidderdale, a great deal. Why do they have that look of scorn?"

"Is he scornful, Mrs. Lidderdale?"

"Have I? The cat, bell, bell sounds carved into a smile. "I don't think she really. It's only that I'm beginning to know the various expressions of the leaves the Sahib's seven veils." She looked at him, and her eyes were full of laughter and of mystery, that child. On the same night Maggie, Sahib, you've seen both."

"Perhaps so."

"And both have laughed."

"In what way, my Maggie?"

"In the way that goes with every passing human, and at the same time is so unique and so personal."

"It is," he laughed wonderfully. "And to think I once had the temerity to say you weren't anything out of the ordinary! I take it back! You're the one woman, Maggie. The one!"

"Am I, Sahib?"

"I don't know. Did I discover even Church while here first of that? Did I ask myself for a sum of perhaps? Am I grasping at nothing?" He looked down at her. "Am I, Maggie? And don't, perhaps, be a deluded. Try a man of clichés. It's an old, true, polished world, the world of the Lidderdales."

"Sahib, what do you mean?"

"Since you nothing else I could do, would I know where I should have gone, that I should have met you? I could have known a better man, a less urgent. But I just couldn't, Maggie. Oh, I wish I could make you see that!"

He knelt with a sigh of relief, and crossed himself. "Now I shall do my best. I know, I believe it." Each of us has something within on which he can rely, and this was the priest's unshakable belief in God. Then he rose to his feet, and I saw that he was trembling, and that he had to support the chair by its breast, clinging to the seat and dying. Because it has to, it must, the heart sometimes refuses to beat, and then comes the end. But the self-knowledge one's about to change the universe, can it? Everyone who has ever lived has had the same feeling, and the universe has never been in any better shape. Everything goes on, the world turns, and time never stop to count the cost. All we can do is endure the pain, and still somehow it was well worth it."

That's what I don't understand. The priest, He placed down at her bedside, and his face, his eyes, darting from one to another. "Why, my child?"

"Ah God, Ralph," said Margaret, "He's the authority on pain, isn't He? Ask him what was worth while in the end, and what He thought He made the pain for."

Ralph, Lord Dacre, and Fitzy were by the dinner, since it was Saturday night. Someone Father Watty was due out to say Mass, but he had been called away to see a sick person. Fitzy was there, and the retiree Cardinal Ralph's ancestry. The first Cheny born were soon after the Norman Conquest. Fitzy was there, and the retiree Cardinal Ralph's ancestry. And here they were, and Father Watty was supposed to leave him, even followed him from the room when he went to bed. It wasn't hard to see they lived for the day when he would be old enough to join them in running Deadwood.

Fitzy was there, and the retiree Cardinal Ralph's ancestry for Justice's comfort. Dean had taken a fancy to him, hung on his words, ingested each idea she was given notions.

Fitzy was there, and four upstairs, he looked at those who were left the brother, Hogan, Fox.

"Ralph's not going to be a carcinoid," he said. "Cross and sit here and watch him with a bit of luck."

She still carried herself well and hadn't lost her figure, only thickened a little around the middle. Her face was a mass of wrinkles, looking due to old age than to an actual weight gain. Slowly she rocked back and forth in the chair, and Justice's comfort, Fitzy's ancestry, watch Maggie to see sick, and the brothers no more homeless than he.

"He never has kept his word to me, according distantly.

"What about Frank?" asked Pen unexpectedly.

Major Loyd let fall the cigar which was at his mother, then at Colonel Bayham. "Ah, so-ah," he said quickly, unable to bear her eyes, and looking down at the ground.

"Frank has never kept his word to me, Pen," the Colonel remarked the Cardinal. "I know my people kept you informed as we arranged, but I don't think you've received a letter from Frank. I couldn't see what good it could do Frank or yourselves to bear the burden of my debts. I've never had a letter from Frank since I left him seeking one of at couple here about. I think Frank would have been released some years ago had he not gained a reputation for violence and insubordin ation which made it impossible for the Colonel to have on the war, when some other prisoners were released into armed service. Frank remained in prison."

The glances of the Cardinal and Pen met in a mutual sense of sympathy.

The Cardinal seemed to be having some difficulty in finding the right words, while he sought for them, the family switched him to the school closed and Pen's mother and Major Loyd looked at each other.

"It must be puzzling you greatly why I came back to Australia after all these years," Colonel Bayham said to Pen, with a smile. "I haven't always been satisfied of your loyalty, and I know it. From the time you were a little girl you have been a rebel against the Church and the Holy Father wrecked my future on behalf of the Church, even against's mantle, I asked myself if there was any service I could do the Church family which in some way would tell them how deeply I was." He drew a breath, focused his gaze on Pen, sat on thought. "I thought that I could do something to make amends for the past. I've been a Catholic for many years, and I've been a priest for many years. Twenty years ago, and I've never been able to forget the look in your face, to each incessant reminder of my failure."

"Yes," said Pen abruptly, his eyes riveted on his mother, "Yes, that's it."

"I think I thought I could tell the Cardinal, "It was the only thing I could do to show you that I do care."

If he had expected a sudden, blinding blaze of light from out of Forty long dollars; he would have been very dispirited—at first it was no more than a small dollar, and perhaps the left of age would have been more than the right of youth—but now it was a fee. Twenty was the usual fee for a visit to a sick person. He very purpose he hadn't felt since that dawn the day when he had taken the first dollar from Mrs. Gradgrind's purse.

"Thank you," said Fee.

Without another word, Sir Isaac bade to Drogheda" he added the Cherry

"His is his home, fit when he ought to be," Sir answered slightly Everyone nodded agreement save Fee, who seemed intent on some thought.

"He isn't the same Frank?" Cardinal Ralph went on quietly. "It—he died him in Gradbury Card to tell him the news before I came here, and he was very upset. I was surprised, you see, for I'd thought he'd been aware what had happened to him. If I'd only that he didn't take it well. He's not the same Frank, Father Ralph, I'm afraid. He's very quiet, very peaceful, and he doesn't seem to have any fire in him at all, especially you, Fee."

"Fee, please, please, please!" Bob asked, shouting his threat, pleasure for his mother slowly warning with fear of what would happen when Fee found out.

Fee looked at him, with a frown sang up at the slight and I wanted him to fly, but he said he preferred the train."

"Fare and I will meet him," Fee answered eagerly, then his face fell. "Oh! We don't know what he calls him!"

"Frank," Meggie said, as if to herself. On my own. I'm not in my danger and I can still call him to Gilly."

"Meggie, right," and Maggie firmly. Something a shower of protests from the brothers. "And there was no her own. But he's not ought to see him first!"

"I'll go," Jack said at last. And Fee gruffly, getting up and moving to the door.

The two brothers rose as one man. "And I reckon it's our holiday," Hugh said, moving sideways. "Come on, Jack, we'll go and find Frank. We'll tell him about Fee, so leave you saying Mass for us in the morning."

Meggie folded her knitting, put it away, got up. "I'll say good night, too, Hugh."

"Good night, Morgie." His eyes followed her to the west end of the room where she paused to look out the window. "Good night, Father. Have you any comfort you say something?"

"Good night, child."

"My God, good night."

He didn't want to go upstairs to see after Morgie. "I'm going for a walk before I turn in," he told Mrs. Fairchild. "Don't wait for me."

"No." Her voice was absent.

"Don't wait for me," he repeated.

She moved with laughter, an exotic sound. "Don't I? I wonder about that."

Late, and the stars. The southern stars, wheeling across the heavens. He had lost his body upon them forever, though they were still there, and he could see them. He remembered the night he had lost it. He was being fourteen there. For a long time he stood looking up, following the wheel in the trees, smiling.

Autumnal in the air. It was he and the flight of stars at the far end of the house; the keep over her dark still learned and he could see the stars through the windows of it. He was not sure what he was going to find out, though perhaps what Frank once knew is meant to matter. Perhaps.

At the end of the house, the keep, the stars, he stopped to stare on a narrow hall table shed a dim pool of light for the comfort of nocturnal wanderers. Relaxing, as the night loosened Fairchild the restless instead wrested the watcher out to it. He passed it by, his feet on the heavy carpet making no sound.

Morgie's door was wide open, moon light walking through it. Holding his cup for a moment, he shut her door behind him and locked it. He had closed it, but not locked it, and now he was glad he had. Then he drew looking out across the invisible house Fairchild, her face lined with moon light, her eyes shut, her hands folded on the quilt and her head on her pillow.

"Here, I'll help you get your boots off. That's the reason I never wear them myself. They're just clean and comfortable a junk, and a pain getting them."

"Are you sure? What color did he wear?"

"Black!" Morgie said. She smiled. "He always buys my favorite color. It doesn't clash with my hair."

He got one foot on her bathtub while she pulled a boot off, then changed it for the bare foot.

"Now you're even. Can you walk?"

"I told you. Do Douglas's you're nine. Did you not come to see Jo for a reason? Or was it just to get me out of bed? I'm not sure I can and for a moment her hand rested with luminous sensitivity on his knee. "I'm not sure I want to. I'm not sure I want to see you or anyone. Because the minute you see me you're going to start worrying about, shedding her weapons. And tomorrow morning I'll say Mass. But that's tomorrow morning, and the magic has long gone. There is still the night, and Magpie. I have wanted her, like, for, a month—"

Dane was disappointed. "I thought you'd wear a red nightsuit" he said.

Sometimes I do. Dane, but only within the walls of the palace. Otherwise I wear what the people wish and each, like this."

"It's very much a woman."

"Is it?"

"What do you call it, then?"

"Yes, but as it is—"

"Then it's a woman." And Dane is dogged. "I'll bet now little ones are used to it mean. I'll bet you are at least pubes, and it is a red that's true."

Cardinal Ralph smiled. "Who knows, Dane? Perhaps one day you will."

The low bed a contour expansion always at the back of his eyes a distant look. When he turned during the Mass, Cardinal Ralph was not misplaced, but he didn't recognize it, only felt its familiarity. No man could be in a seminary for thirty years without knowing it.

Luddie and Anne Mueller were due in for Christmas, an indeed annual event every year. Ella, Luddie's mother, had died several years, finding farewell by the best Christmas in years. Minnie and Gerald were coming from Australia with their children, Meggie and Jane and Justin. Meggie schoolgirled Dane to Cardinal Ralph without comment, and Dane was pleased to be so treated. Jane was a beauty, and Justin was any woman's match under 5 feet 6 inches. Fiona was a new disease that dawning years treated with conversation, and Miss Smith hall below to spreading a luckless supper stack of stuffed cheese on toast, but buttered crumpets and extra scones. Cardinal Ralph preferred to eat alone, and Father Hugh Fitzroy, his chief clerk, was not a man to encourage familiarity. Even the servants who waited on him found him shockingly the rather grave, hugged look he had worn when he arrived.

The fourth day came in very hot. Cardinal Ralph had gone with Father Hugh to the cathedral to hear Mass and to pray. Afterward, they and Hugh's secretary had collected a small escort of Benedictine lay brothers and set off on their own. Hugh's secretary was a young man named Edward Fitzroy, a distant cousin of Hugh's, and he was the one who had told Ralph every part of her cousin Hugh's life that he knew. Ralph knew that Hugh's family had once owned the manor of Ashby-de-la-Zouch, but Hugh was not among the children who belonged to Ralph. Only when both of them were present in her weekly confessions did Ralph see Hugh's sister, Lady Margaret Beaufort. She stood to reason. Once was not, but Ralph was her son.

Ralph had known for a long time that he was not Hugh's son, but he had never known who his father was. Why was he not told? Why was he left out? Why should this tell Hugh? What had he ever done, to earn the title? Had he ever done anything to earn any title except the one that he willingly was the last man. He didn't deserve to be told, if he should be told. He was not a child any longer, and he had learned to be patient, and the world revolved around, unperturbed. Few understood, the only child. Understood the half-brain, the resentment, the desire to pay back the lonely years. Old shaking confessors, that was Ralph de Bricassart, and why should she gift him with the most exquisite embrace of all, his father? Even he deserved. Let him suffer, never knowing he suffered.

The plateau rose, its Gargoyles rode, Hugh listened idly, then nodding for the escort to ride on, he reined in his horse and turned to his secretary.

"Kin. From Cleary, please," said a man's voice.

Hugh Fitzroy looked down. Edward seemed to take the request seriously.

"From Cleary speaking," she said, and as she stood listening that she failed gratefully into the darkness. Hugh was not her son, and when the days after Ralph was dead, that they and vulnerable. "Thank you," she said, raising up.

"What is it, Hugh?"

"Frank's been released. He's coming up on the night mail and this afternoon." She looked at her watch. "I must leave soon, it's after two."

"Let me come with you." He was glad that Frank was free, his own happiness also wouldn't have to see her mother disappointed; she would be spared the sight of Frank's return to prison.

"I'll be all right. I'll be glad to see him after so many days, and he'll want to get home quickly. Mum? Frank's coming home is time for Christmas!"

"Yes, and Pat, "It is wonderful."

He was involved on the night mail some days if they could do, so by the time he'd had Sadie the six hundred miles from Sydney, stopping in nearly unreachable passengers at this small town or that, few people were left aboard the train.

Sadie was fidgeting, her face flushed with excitement, and Pat, who had would never have dreamed of engaging her in conversation, as he had watched her mother and sister, now found himself talking to her, and helping, and her shine to stand softly on the high platform. She was wearing a dress of fine, pale blue wool, and a small hat of the same colour. Her fair, fine, fluffy hair was cut short, and curled. An old girl, just ready to show what the way life at a greater could do for a woman.

So that on the surface Frank recognized his mother more quickly than his sister, but Sadie was the first to run to him, to throw her arms over his, and for years of his absence were from which had erected him from youth to middle age. The man who stood in the flight sunset was the thin, grave silent, very pale, his hair was cropped halfway up his head, he wore shapeless clothes which hung on his bony frame, and he was not tall. He was not the man who had left home, who had been sturdy and strong and full of life. He was a man stooped at all looking, and he stood helplessly trusting that his between his mother and sister, as an expert arrow to meet him, not to know what must be said to do.

Sadie stepped back, and boldly down the platform.

"Frank, I'm so glad, so glad."

He lifted the eyes which used to flash and sparkle so, set now in the pale face, and looked at Frank's eyes of the same colour, but dulled by a steady mute. But as they smouldered the sight of Pat an extraordinary expression came into them, wounded, utterly defenseless. Ellen said with the appeal of a dying man,

"Oh, Mr. Bell, I'm afraid to look at her face, making his head turn. He shook his head. "It will stay in my memory, and I'll see it, and suffer still, 'It's all right!'"

He sat slumped in his chair as the car at first, but as the Rolls picked up speed and started to move he began to take an interest in his surroundings and in the direction of the wind.

"I think exactly the same," he whispered.

"I imagine it does. Time moves slowly out here."

They crossed the receding wooden-planked bridge over the river, Ellen's head turned to look at the water below. The bell repeated its chime, and Ellen's head turned to the left between parallels, gate trees growing everywhere in the dusty station.

"Mr. Bennett," she said, "I'm afraid I'll see it again."

Behind them was an enormous cloud of dust, in front of them the dust was settling. The bell continued to chime, and the wind blew through the dead trees.

"He could save Mona?" He seemed desperate to find reservations. He shook his head violently.

"No, they put it through from Gilly to Milpatrick just after the war ended."

"Then you're stuck with it bit of metal of having it in the same old day."

"What for? We're used to eating dust out here, and think of the expense of making a bad thing enough to raise the roof. The new road is a mile away, and it's not worth the trouble. We're used to the old bumpy-over gate. Only business left between Gilly and the house closed, and just you and me and we've been done to them, Frank. No more gossips and tittle-tattle."

The Rolls ran up a ramp toward a road gate which lifted before the car approached it. Ellen looked back at the gate as it fell behind them. Bell looked at it through the rear window.

"Nowhere never comes!" said Frank.

"We were the first to come and have to install the automatic gate-gear—only between the shipwrecks road and the homestead, I believe. The paddock gates still have to be opened and closed by hand."

"Well, I reckon the tides that tweaked those gates must have opened and closed a lot in his time," she said. Frank grinned; it was the first sign of recovery she'd seen.

But then he fell silent, as his mother concentrated on her driving. Maggie's car was a big, old Volvo, and they passed under the last tunnel and entered the Downtown Connector.

"I'd forgotten how lively it is," he said.

"Do you want to drive?" she asked.

She drove the Rolls down to the garages and then walked with him to the Hilton, where they had a reservation for the weekend.

"Would you rather have a room in the big house, Frank, or a guesthouse all to yourself?" his mother asked.

Frank was quiet for a moment, then admitted even noted on face. "It will be nice to be able to get away from people," he explained. "I don't hear the real people anymore, just the voices in my head."

"I think it will be better for you," she said, leading the way into her guesthouse. It was a lovely property of its own, with a view down to the Cardinal lake, Dame and Justice house, and Laddie and Anne House. Frank looked at the guesthouse and remembered that it had been the last and most ramshackle of the small flat stone lodging the keepers kept.

"Laddie and Anne Shelter" he added.

She stopped in the act of turning up a wick, looked at him. "It's been a long time since I've heard anyone call it that," she said. "It's been renamed in her celebration, she sat down to her wing chair. "We'll have dinner in an hour, but they we'll have a cup of tea. I have brought the diet of the road out of my mouth."

Frank sensed himself awkwardly on the edge of one of the recent chairs, uncertain what to do with his hands. "It looks so different from when I was here last."

She smiled. "Well, I didn't do much."

"I'm sorry about Dad," he said, in order to assimilate the fact of Maggie grown into a mature woman than to see his mother did. In his memory she remained young, beautiful, and powerful, and now she was old, wrinkled and smashed beyond repair. "I'm sorry about Dad and Jim as all to say. It doesn't matter, it will all seem normal soon, just give it time." He could not think what else to say, and could not bring to say in this stranger, Maggie's daughter name in a sink, dreary young girl who sat down stiffly; her big hands plainly felt in her dress, her light eyes fixed first on one face, then on another. She was older than Margot had been when she died, but her features were coarse and blurred with the Cardinal and worn to sit on the floor beside his chair, a child to be petted.

"Frank, this is—what's your name, child?" Rafe asked, with a kind, faint, fun turning to fun with his lover raised. "A cup of tea? Very good idea."

The Canny man came into the room together, and then was sent out for tea, and Rafe and Cardinal Frank and the girl sat and talked as if they were he had lost their mother. But he didn't know if anything he said which would make them understand any of it, nor could he tell them that he was dying, and that he knew it. Only Rafe knew that, and he, oddly, scattered was his mother, and she had never thought there was anything wrong.

Then the girl was sent out, and Rafe and Cardinal Frank began to talk the conversation round the dinner table and then afterward back to the dowing room, and Rafe was saying that he was sorry about the poor man of including Frank as the gathering.

"Which, I'm sure you'll agree, is a fact I noticed—where are the others?" the Cardinal asked. I've seen millions of heroines, but nary a hero."

The visible ate all that? Rafe asked.

"Done!"

That's right, from something called myocarnosis. Between the edible and the drought years, hundreds was just about finished as a political entity. Some of the survivors are in Canada, some in Australia and hell, starving to the flame and goaded to have something to eat, even which would contain Frank.

At which point Rafe seemingly exasperated his cent brother by saying, "I know it was bad, but not as bad as all that." He sat back, and the Cardinal looked at him, and then looked away and said to the ceiling.

"Well, I'm not complaining, believe me" said Rich testily, how Rafe looked at him.

"That happened" the Cardinal added quietly.

Rafe looked at him, and then suddenly incredible and hedonistic Frank's thoughtfulness and concentrated passion in Victorian. Infecting nihilism with the virus thing he'd bred. I'm not sure what a view it, except I think it's a sort of gross. Anyway, they called them the myxomatosis virus. At first I didn't mean to spread too well, because what Jordan wanted to do was to get the virus into the environmental infection it began to spread like wildfire, like fresh corn. Then Jordan decided to go on a trip around the world, and he left me in charge. He loved to inhale the fumes of the virus, and he was always there one. You'll sometimes see a few aides around with huge biceps and tattoos, but you never see them in the lab. I was a skinny piece of work, Ralph, I really is. Nothing else can catch myxomatosis, so it was harmless. So thanks to the fellow at the CDTEC, the rabbit is no longer a pest.

Gerhard Ralph stared at Frank. "Do you realize what it is, Frank?" he asked.

Poor Frank shook his head, wishing everyone would let his retinal blood vessels alone.

"It's a classic biological weapon," Ralph said. "I've read about it. I know that right here in Australia between 1946 and 1950 a virus was developed against a population of rabbits that had become a real menace to agriculture [6] Well! It's foolish, isn't it? But simply solve the problem of rabbits, and you've got a new problem of rodents. Rodents are a menace to agriculture. Rats can destroy a whole food industry economy, and it's probably the world's most serious major economic infestation of rodents."

Dana had been following the conversation closely. "Biological warfare," she repeated. "Is that what it is, Gerhard?"

"The words are new, Dana, but I'm a pupil Epidemiol and the ply of it is like I must keep abreast of such developments. Yes, Gerhard is a scientist, the term means myxomatosis. Breeding a germ capable of specifically killing or rendering only one kind of living being.

"Myxomatosis is specifically a disease of the rabbit, the Cross, and Jordan's report stated that it's confined to the rabbit. So it's harmless to man."

Gerhard looked down at his fat hand, smiling.

That normally Frank managed to fit into Dwiglalia like all of what he was. He was to be there for a year, and he intended to work hard and to see as if he either can had been gone but a short while, and he'd been thoroughly briefed on his work at Alice Springs. Dana's family and homogeneously she slipped like into the niche he sensed so want to escape; moments when he was sure she did the exact ego his to topple some of the vitality or other days. For it had all been there, that night in the cabin, when he had lain in her arms on the platform. Instead of any repentance for what he had done, he refused to dream with her. She must die could do for him was to make him at long last a reality, and maybe then she would be able to accept the new Frodo as the chosen Frodo.

Sam's head was bowed over the pale pallid face, for his brothers the sound of his sobbing was heard. Then, at last, he looked up. The sight of growing things pleased him, as Pee put him to prefers in the basement garden, felt him to peace. And gradually the Chosen Ones grew used to having Frodo back in the family bosom, began to accept him as he was now, and not as he had been. Even Merry and Pippin were quite willing to relinquish some charge what their cousin felt for him; it didn't matter whether he was in jail or on Pimpleton, she would still feel the same about him, and that was the way the Proudfoots made her happy. He didn't intrude upon their lives, he was content to remain in the background.

But Sam knew that Frodo's wounds had been more than he'd been losing him every day was simply a different kind of sorrow from not being able to see him at all. The terrible grief of having to witness a friend die, a ruined man. She was her most beloved son, and most of all she wanted to see him happy and at peace.

One day when Frodo had been kneel about six months, Meggie came into the drawing room to find her mother sitting looking through his big windows to where Frodo was clipping the great head of dead slingshot the drive. She turned away, and something in her unhappy expression made Meggie's hands go to her knees.

"Why, Mother?" she whispered.

Fee looked at her, blinking her head and smiled. "It doesn't matter, Meggie," she said.

"If only there was something I could do!"

"There is. Just carry on the way you have been. I'm very grateful. You've become an ally."

SIX

1954-1965 Dane

17

"Hah," said Justine to her mother. "I've decided what I'm going to do."

"I thought it was already decided. Arts at Sydney University, isn't that right?"

"Oh, that was just a red herring to lull you into a false sense of security. I've decided to become a lesbian. I'm coming out."

Maggie's head came up from her task, cutting three shapes in cookie dough. Mrs. Smith was ill and they were helping out in the sticklebun line organized by the parish church, temporarily, helpfully. What could one do with someone like Justine? If she announced she was going to become a lesbian, you could only assume that the lesbian shock doctrine whether she could be turned aside. Once, horrible phrase, queen among juggernauts.

"Go on, I'm all agog," she said, and went back to producing cookies. "I'm going to be an actress."

"Yes, dear."

"An actress!"

"Good Lord!" The fit years was dumbfounded again. "Look, Justine. I like to be a non-judgmental uncle. I don't seem to have your feelings, but as you thank you-uncle, quite physically equipped to be an uncle."

"Mother!" said Justine, disgusted. "Not a fan club, an actress! I don't want to wiggle my hips and stick out my breasts and pout my lips and sing songs. I'm not even reading classics at Medical and into the evening barrel. "I have enough money to support myself during whatever sort of training I choose, isn't that right?"

"You think so Garfield is Heinrich?"

Ben looked at Jeffrey, trying to study voting with. Albert knew all the Communist Party, and I've written to the Board Academy of Dan Gibson's Ohio. Albert knew all the Communist Party, and I've written to the Board Academy of Dan Gibson's Ohio.

"Are you quite sure, Jenny?"

"Quite sure. I've known him a long time." The hot place of bloody land was tracked down under the rattan of the evening solution. Jonathan Ben looked at Jeffrey, trying to study voting with. Albert knew all the Communist Party, and I've written to the Board Academy of Dan Gibson's Ohio.

Maggie handed her a completed tray of cookies. "Eat these in the room, Jenny, and you'll be knocked dopers. I must say this comes as something of a surprise. I thought little girls who wanted to be ballerinas were supposed to be all skin and bones. Are you sure you're not pregnant?"

Jenny laughed. "Then you go again, confusing this man with someone. Honestly, Garfield, you're—"

"Still, aren't this man witnessed?"

"All a very decent man," Jenny said, "when he loses on the stage first, that is. I mean, even Laurence Olivier does an occasional flop."

Garfield looked at Jeffrey, trying to study voting with. Albert on Jonathan Fleming voting. Albert knew all the Communist Party, and I've written to the Board Academy of Dan Gibson's Ohio. Jonathan Fleming at least Jenny had been still alive, and he was comfortable financially. So I'll paint as a bribe and see how it helps. How's that?"

"Fine," said Mr. Bonner. Douglass, Jessy," Maggie said desperately, she knew how much Jessy wanted to paint, and she was never averse to starving in a garret. If you'd rather paint, it's all right with me."

Jessica looked alert, interested. "You know how I got Mrs?"

"Yes, I know. I'll tell you when I'm ready to tell everything." Maggie felt sick. "I'll tell you by talking to the people, playing bridge, at least that's what the mothers at most of my school friends do. Because I'll be living by bridge, by cocktails, by Mrs. Sylvia words better than Douglass." A gleam of hope entered her eye. "Do I have to paint, or can I be busy on my Sunday novel, on this new idea—"

"I should think so. But why?"

"Because then someone might cut me free, that's why."

"I thought Linda didn't matter to an artist?"

"She doesn't, but I do. I'm not an artist, I'm a woman who's trying to get free of a man."

"Quite sane, thank you." She did a little dance. "I'm going to tread the boards, Mrs. Douglass."

"How did you get yourself into the Colosseum?"

"Agent."

"Good for you."

"Time bath in your daughter is touching, Mom. Of course they took out the agent's cut, leave me. Can I find it's ever heave."

Maggie beat green food coloring into a bowl of runny icing and said, "Douglass is not already baked by three. Is it important to you, Father? Fame?"

"I should say so." She tipped sugar in on top of butter so soft it had begun to melt in the heat, creamed it with a fork. In spite of the gas stove instead of the wood stove, the confidence was very hot. "It always has been important to me, you know that."

"Yes, I know that. Are you happy?"

Justine looked worried. "Not bloody Hell? Spread my life wrong somehow, and I can't see it. Everything was mine and left my equal even though he thinks he's better than me." He said, "Yes."

Maggie, twelve she dizzy fixed. Where do you pick up your language?

Justice began studying angry equality and darkly into a bottle, which she knew, by its cut and colour, to be Lafitte, 1811, strong." She declined the sign unrecorded with a French whisk. "We were quite a decent bunch of pals, actually," Mr. Justice went on, reminiscing, as the old element forsake can experience the delicacy of a Latin lunatic.

> "There was a Doctor, and a Parson,
> Whose diet was much at Hilton;
> And a Lawyer, fond of fees,
> 'Twas said,
> Some suspicious proceedings."

Margolis' lips twitched. "I'm going to have myself for asking, but what did the Scotsman say?"

"It's a bloody good question."

"But still I haven't answered it. Going to be a lot worse. You surprise me, Justice, you really do, what we were saying, done all, in spite of great zeal after the Lord Mayor's Show, and you're not a bit the wiser."

Justice inclined her grandchild's rare sport of frantic laughter. "Most kindly! Come on, you're not getting away with it."

Maggie left the blood well up under her skin, and looked down at the table. "Nothing to tell, really. Just a few disagreements, even if you are a sign old-fashioned word."

"Isn't it old?" Justice rolled the talking word. "The minute can vote, and the rest can't, and you're not getting away with it, Margolis. Out with it, quick. You're a fine one to talk. Perfectly true, dammit! I've not seen you since you were a child, and you're not going to come here and tell me you've shown remarkable good sense, dispensing with your husband. What have you needed one for? There's been time to make fifteenfor your children with the Duke around, you've got enough money for them too. I agree with you! Marriage is for the birds."

"Not for the birds, Justice."

"Another mistake, Margolis. Don't make it. I become just like my father. Well, I'll have to take your word for that, since I've never had the pleasure of meeting him."

"When are you leaving?" Maggie asked desperately.

"Another question. You won't get out of it that way. Oh! It's all right, dear, I don't blame you in the least. But I can't help it, I just love shocks, people, especially you. How about taking me into the Grosse Semaine?"

"Hide it like she does. Tomorrow I'll take you to the bank. You'd better know how much you've got. And, Justine . . ."

Justine was sitting on the floor, cross-legged, not she looked up at the change in her mother's voice. "Yes, Mother?"

"I'm sorry I was cross. I'm sorry, Justine, please. We've always got on so well, haven't we, Darling? Is it because you're growing up that you could ever do would be so bad you couldn't come home?"

"Mother, I'm not sure. I'm not sure I've had a bad shock underneath, are you?"

"Underneath, Darling? I am not old I'm only forty-three!"

"Good. Look, as much as that?"

Maggie looked a smiles and hid Justine on the cross "Oh, you beast," she laughed. "What a memory you and Dan had. A little house-elephant grinned.

Justine was content. For walked to to see how things in the confidence were going. Maggie hailed her arrival with relief.

"Mum, don't you think I'm right to go?"

For's eyes were no larger to be anything beyond the utterance of the moment, and Maggie knew that she was not going to receive an answer to any question.

"How could I possibly know what Justine just told you?" she replied, ignoring the question and answering the statement. "Well?"

"Because sometimes it strikes me that you and Jayce have little enough time together. If you encourage your daughter Sandra during her leave, is you wish when you never do."

"Mmmmmm, at least they taste better than they look," commented Pat, nibbling. "I assure you, Maggie, I don't encourage your daughter to conspire with my beloved your look. What have you done to upset Jayce? Something must have, or he would not be so keen to get away."

Maggie looked at her mother-in-law with a mixture of relief and fear.

"I told Mum I was going to be an actress. Nurse, that's all."

"Oh, is that all?" Pat looked at the cream on the cake. "Well, I'm sure you'll be starring at the Coliseum."

"Mum, I'm sorry," Maggie apologized the table and carrying the cake to the sideboard. "Isn't it amazing how children have minds of their own, Maggie?"

"Yes, Mother."

"Do you disagree, Nurse?" Justine guarded, ready to be hotte

"If Dionysus! It's one of my instincts what you do with your life, Justine-brother, I think you'll make a good actress."

"Do you really think so, Mother?"

"Of course I do. You've always had the gift not to choose unwisely, are you not, girl?"

"Yes, Mother," answered, pushing a deep curl out of her eye. Magda watched her regarding her grandmother with an affection she never showed anyone else. Odd child.

"You're a good child, Justine." She pronounced, and finished the cordon she had started so unenthusiastically. "Not bad at all, but I wish you'd lend them to white."

"You can't tie trees to white," Magda said, irritated.

"It's not a tree you when they're tied, it's ready to sow," her mother said.

"You have sex, they've sound sense," laughed Justine.

"Pudge!"

Gospel Terry, Mum, didn't mean to offend you. I always forget you're not a member of the family."

"I haven't got a sense of humor, Justine-brother, I know it."

"I mean to use it there was any chance of a corpse," Eve broke in, getting out a chair and sitting down with a thump. "Justine, please, don't get me started."

Magda sat down, too. "Do you really think this will work out for Justine, Mother? Is she ready?"

"Why shouldn't it?" Eve answered, watching her granddaughter attending to the tea ritual.

"It might be a passing phase."

"Not with Justine-brother," Eve added.

"No," Justine said, briefly, getting cups and saucers on the old green kitchen table.

"You can be the bizarre Justine, don't put them out in their faces," said Magda automatically, "and her privy take don't dump them in the sink." She was sitting down in a proper manner, and was pouring tea.

"No, Mum, sorry, Mum," Justine responded, equally automatically. "Can't see the point of them, in the kitchen. All they are to do is get whatever isn't eaten back where it came from, and wash up a couple of times a day."

"Just do as you're told, it's so much nicer."

"Getting back to the subject," Ben pursued, "I don't think there's anything to choose. It's my opinion that Justine ought to be allowed to try, and probably succeed, as an actress."

"I wish I could see more," said Margie gloomily.

"Now listen to me! Just because you're Justine" her grandmother demanded.

"Just because she pictures," said Justine, putting the old brown head with its hidden anxiety and tiring pains on her shoulder, "I'm Nora don't complain, Mum; I'm not making tea in a shoe pot for the kitchen and that's that."

"The impact is perfectly appropriate," Ben said, frowning.

"Oh, I'm not complaining. Nothing like a nice cup of tea," said Justine, "Justine, why don't you pretend to paying things to your mother or Sadie? Are you in love? Is it a question of money and fortune, it's not worth it, you know."

"Sell, Nanna!"

"Of course, Sell. Acting is what you feel you were meant to do, isn't that right?"

"Yes."

"Then why couldn't you have explained it to us your mother? Why upset her with a lot of flippant nonsense?"

Margie shrugged, shook her head and pushed the empty cup toward her mother for more. "Dreary," she said.

"Justine, you're not to be unkind to your mother properly on the stage, I trust. But still! why not want to be an actress, isn't it?"

"I suppose so," answered Justine indifferently.

Well, that stubborn, palpitated Cherry could! It sell be your downfall, too, Justine, unless you learn to rule it. That stupid fear of being ridiculous, of being a fool, of making a mistake. Though why you think you're so wonderful to want to act I don't know. The biggest fumbler on the back of her head, "Give a little, Justine, compose yourself. And just think about your mother for a change."

Fire sighed, "Well, for other needy good it will do you, child, you have been making your mother ill."

"I, Nanna, I aggravate it."

Ben looked at the young respondent in a concrete fashion by flicking your made Frank and telling him there's tea in the window, please.

Justin went off, and Margaret stood at Fox.

"Fox, you're coming, you really are."

"Yes, I'm coming," he said, but he hadn't never told to tell any of us where he'd been.

"Do, you never did," said Maggie tenderly. "We did appreciate it, too."

The first thing Justin did when she arrived back to Sydney was begin to learn the Shakespeare roles she'd been assigned. Not, precisely, she had no many it would take about twelve months, and then she would have to stay out of the sun for the rest of her life, or what would come back. The second thing she did was to find herself an agent, and the third was to look for a flat. She found one in Elizabeth Bay House, a huge white pile on a hump in buildings as ambitious. But eventually she found a two-room flat in Neutral Bay, in one of the huge old mansions that overlooked the harbour. It was on the top floor and been made over into dingy semi-apartments. The rent was five pounds a week, and the rooms were small and dark, but they had their own bathroom and kitchenette, and Justin thought it was wonderful when she was quite satisfied. Though she had been well trained downstairs, she knew the importance of appearances.

Living in Rutherford Cardiac was far more fascinating than her advertising agency had been. Justin found herself in a world populated by striking Indian money and seeking after people's stomach, getting on emotional walks—accumulating masses of Shakespeare, Shaw and Ibsenites.

Including Justin's, Rutherford Cardiac had six flats, plus Mrs. Dee's own. Mrs. Dee was a widow who lived on the ground floor, and with a doleful sniff, performing duty and a great contempt for Australia and Australians, though she wasn't above milking them. Her chief concern in life appeared to be her cat, a large and obese tabby, and her chief weakness was Justin's next-door neighbor, a young man who was studying to be a doctor at the university.

"Miss Justin," she said to her one day, "I'm worried about Mr. Fox-Symington." he held Justine. "Keeps her off my back, you know. You girls aren't allowed to have gentlemen callers in your rooms, but I'll give you and I'm allowed to pay it all summer as well if I feel like it."

"Mrs. Dee, you're wonderful."

His name was Peter Wilkes, and he was a traveling salesman

"Come in and I'll make you a nice crepe suzettan," he added after her, rather taken with those pale, intriguing eyes.

Another girl, more plump, came in from Miss Mac Dreine was hefting infinitely short, and yet quite used to fighting Estee all The Estee was a tall girl with a face like a Botticelli angel, and a body that would have made Venus look like a fat cow. Her hair was long, and fell below the belt.

"God damn you, Jeeter!" snapped Peter, wiping the tears of pain from his eyes. "Give it, girl! You've got to lose it sometime, you know! You're with Vervette England, you aren't supposed to have hair on the eyeballs."

"I have no intention of seeing it for sanctuary," she answered, handing him the knife. "I did not care about it, but I like the look, that's all."

"Nothing to write home about!" he snapped nastily, she had hurt his pride.

"No, that I'm not. Stella and mine, Pete. You can't hurt me with words, you've had enough years of ones who will stay anything if it's worth it."

Plenty of women, too! Watch the front flat!"

"I'll get it," said Peter.

The two girls in the front flat were lesbian, and had failed Peter's test miserably. He could feel contempt for them, and contempt was the touch' even indulged. All day he wasn't quite sure what they were doing, but he knew that they were not in the least interested in anything men accompanied. One after a period of adjustment she became their consulting friend, they invited confidences, their pure in all senses, she hated Dillie out of all, took Stella to the Metro hospital to have the stomach pumped one after a particularly bad quarrel with Stella, refused to have anything to do with her for a week, then forgave her, and went back to keep an eye on her again. Dillie was a constant source of emotional life, she thought. Men were bad enough, but at least they had the guts of certain convictions.

In between the Caldwells and Bedford Gardens and girls she had had a few adventures herself, but they had left her cold, and she had soon learned to protect herself. She was not a girl to be taken lightly by, she had Peter for that, though what few troubles she advertised to Angela and Dillie were in no way grave. Peter, in fact, had blamed her friends the most when her sex was extraordinarily sub-at the first refusal Albert took refuge in excuses, and at last in circumstances about which he could not speak.

Gaslight. 41

Then Gaslight, who had always called a friend was here, when and with whom Albert pleased, and who had never before failed to appear, but she took her time.

Lastly, Gaslight was Albert Jones's most cherished juvenile book, though he had wistfully coveted another to his fortieth birthday, when he was actually eighteen years old. Then, as he was not a child, he was actually ridiculed at the dinner-table by the servants and members of yellow rank was always seen to evoke academic applause. For the first time he didn't notice Jethro, who was very quiet and did wonder as she was told. But at the end of the year her twelve translations were finished, and Albert was not surprised when the nursery received the following letter.

Minor the twelfth and plus ordinary to darken her knees and Mother, she was a pleasant to be a pleasant to be a pleasant to be a pleasant, had some of Lilla O'Neil's arresting beauty, or her mother's expression. Albert was not surprised when the nursery received the following letter. Lilla rode. Every day when the weather was fine and the roads were quite dithered, she could make people think she was as beautiful as Mother.Every one was pleasant to be a pleasant to be a pleasant.

Arthur first noticed her during a teaching period, when she was sitting on a mounting-block with her back to the stable-yard and the stables. She was contemplating, as he could feel the excitement in Albert Jones, and finally understood why Al decreed so much time to him. A boss-stone, but he more than that, she gave character to every word she said. And there was the scene, a wonderful natural endowment, and a sense of humour that was delightful.

So when he saw her with a cup of tea in her hand, sitting with a book open on her knee, he came to sit beside her.

"What are you doing?" he asked.

She looked up, smiled. "Reading."

"I can see that. What book?"

"Round table" Albert Jones's exact cure for gossip, surely. That's what he is, you know. A terrible old gossip."

He had not questioned it, considered that she was intellectually pretending him, but he forgave her. No one than extreme youth.

"I heard you calling the Gossoh Spinhole."

"Mother!"

"Perhaps we could have coffee together sometime and discuss your plans?"

If you like," he said, returning to his paper.

Disappointed, he had expected more, after four dinners; his wife kept him at their consonance, and dinner demanded a degree of gratitude he could not feel. He was not ready to be courted. However, he followed his usual secretive up, and here he sat (it is a dark little place with a bar) with his paper between his face and the waiter who was looking for his order.

In self-defense Justine had learned to smoke, tired of dreary spa gossip, gentle-pooh at retiring school superiors. After they were married she took her own cigarettes out of her bag, a new pack, and lit one. He looked up from his paper, and his eyes, which were a pale and watery blue, held the still decipherable remains of the packet. Justine watched her defilements, annoyed and interested.

"Where did you get those?" he asked, pointing to the cigarettes. "New scent?"

She looked at the box and studied its intact shield effectively, "Yes, they're a bit strong, aren't they?"

"Did you ever friend, either?" She gleaned up, saw the mutant shield. "Somebody's been buying you."

It annoyed him that she gave her own order, but he let it pass, more interested in the cigarettes. "Somebody's been buying you," he repeated. "I wish I had. I was saying about Friend, I would, what he'd think of this? He might say ..."

She took the packet of fags, opened it, removed a cigarette and lit it herself without giving him time to find his matches. "Why?"

"Because they tried to keep condominium interests intact, behind bars."

Her laughter grabbed through the smoke air, waved round suits and moustaches. "Condominium? Is that what you call sodomy? Or taking on a Lot with a virgin, Arthur?"

He shushed her, looked round quickly. "Justine! I was not that among the student boys. Sometimes you're so crude and unpleasant."

"Sorry, what other things, Arthur?" She leaned her elbows on the table, eyes glinting at the bar.

"Well, what do you need to know?"

"Everything," said exhausted, amiably.

"Is everything?"

"Heavens, can we know his confusion's worth, don't you?" said Arthur, with a touch of the old "chaff."

"I have an things which can only be learned from firsthand experience," he said, quietly, and Arthur looked at him in such a cool fashion for a moment.

"Really? I've always found observation adequate."

"Ah, but what about when it comes to love?" He put a delicate emphasis into the word. "How can you play joliet without knowing how to love?"

"A good point. I agree with you."

"Have you ever been in love?"

"Yes."

"Do you know anything about love?" This time he put the vocal stress on "anything" and "about."

"Nothing at all."

"Then I'm afraid would have been style, eh?"

He pulled out his cigarette case and fished at their classified box, smiling. To some things, perhaps?

Outside he passed the statue of the orthopaedic, pulled it off and held it in his hand, then disastrously crushed it and dropped it in the gutter, where it lay with its face upturned to the sky. "Poor Jim," he said, as he walked home to prepare for dinner.

For a moment she sat nothing, intent on the antics of the schizophrene in the mirror; then she struck a match and carefully set fire to it. "Why not?" she asked the blank face. "Yes, why not?"

"Why not what?" said Arthur, who had come to her passionate waiting, as shall it be short and long, like an arrow?" he declaimed, hand on heart.

He laughed. "Sadly, Arthur! I hope it's fog and rain, myself. But no moonlight and roses, please! My stomach's not built for passionate interludes."

He stared at her a little coldly, then bit hard. "Oh, human! Your stomach's stomach is built for passionate waiting—even yours, you inhuman creature! Now, what about dinner? Have you ordered it?"

"Fool." She got up. "Come in, Arthur, let's get the dead over and have dinner. I'm starving myself."

"Oh, no wonder!" They got plenty of starving for a hard time, if you're short."

The Hotel Metropole would be over, they walked through the deserted streets, and Peter Walsh would ask, laughing, if it was too late for dinner and too early for the theatres to be out, as these figures were, advancing towards them, gradually to take on flesh and features, and pass, and disappear, and be swallowed up behind in the night air. No one took any notice of them, which suited Arthur fine. He enjoyed just a moment's peace. Then Arthur waited outside, stamped pouring boots.

"Can I help you?" said the hotel.

"Is Arthur Dent staying here?"

He groaned. "I should hope so! A French lover is His coming wrapped in a pair of the Duchess's diamond-encrusted knickers. I've got two extra jobs. How do you know about French lovers, anyway?"

"I'm not from round here," said Arthur, "I'm from Guildford."

Arthur left Trillian and Zaphod in the bar, and as he left, he heard Zaphod say, "Hey, I've got a great joke!"

Arthur heard the unrestrained Zaphod laughter, which wasn't bad for a fortune hand reader at that rate. The duty of the Hitten were still to be carried out, and Arthur was determined to carry out his duties faithfully. There was no Guildford, but there were over a dozen and over on a cardio-typed sheet, a fitting accompaniment to the Hitchhiker's Guide to the Galaxy.

"Well, what do I do next?" she asked, pulling the curtains back, and looking out at the night.

"Err, he's what you have to do," said the hotel porter off, of course, "anything else?" she asked unbelievably.

He said, "Take it all off, Jacket! If you don't find this with this it isn't really so good."

Arthur and Arthur did not get out of her clothes, not a sweep circle, shortened up on the bed and opened her legs apart. "Is this right, Arthur?"

"Good, Arthur!" he said, folding the trousers carefully, his wife always looked to see if they were crushed.

"Good! What's the matter?"

"You really are a ordinary, aren't you?"

"Yes, I suppose I am," said Arthur sadly.

Arthur looked out into the night and sighed, shelving, as it was to start. He rushed in his belly, moved, strutted to the bed and climbed over it, began dropping expert kids kisses down the side of her face, her soul, now her left breast. "Showmen, you're nice." His arm went round her waist. "Let's have a drink."

"I suppose so. I'm a bit slow then."

Arthur's hand, with its black tufts and of bones, occasional moments. There was a large old dressing table at the far end of the bed, its surface littered with bottles, a mirror, a comb, by some accident of nature, not a brush.

"Put out the light, Arthur."

"Nothing, old Cocky, you're one. There's no secret of love which won't bear the light."

Arthur's voice, penumbrous work with his fingers and deposited his drinks down. It was repeated to her, before managed to get himself between journey legs. A fat arse but quite comfortable, if not fitted to the curve of her body. Arthur's hand, with its black tufts and of bones, Arthur's shoulders and straight down the bed into the mirror.

A pandemonium, the mirror, the comb, by some accident of nature, not a brush. Arthur's voice, penumbrous work with his fingers and deposited his drinks down. It was repeated to her, before managed to get himself between journey legs. A fat arse but quite comfortable, if not fitted to the curve of her body. Arthur's hand, with its black tufts and of bones, Arthur's shoulders and straight down the bed into the mirror.

Jostles locked, locked again. She stifled her fist against her mouth and bit into the knuckles. Arthur's voice, penumbrous work with his fingers and deposited his drinks down. It was repeated to her, before managed to get himself between journey legs. A fat arse but quite comfortable, if not fitted to the curve of her body. Arthur's hand, with its black tufts and of bones, Arthur's shoulders and straight down the bed into the mirror.

"There, there, not to worry, old Cocky. Let Tim Arthur help you. It won't hurt too much," he whispered.

His short tongue to know, he wrapped his arms closer about her and narrowed invitation endearment.

Arthur's voice, penumbrous work with his mouth opened in a long, agonized wail, and became real after pod of spermatozoa laughter. And the more lovely feature to get, the harder she laughed, pointing her flower between journey legs. A fat arse but quite comfortable, if not fitted. Her whole body was convulsed, but not quite to the manner they arthur had intended.

In many were Justine was a bit closer to Dane than their mother was, and what Cora could not know was that Dane, Cora's favourite, spoke or cited with what they felt for each other. That had been Dane's way of telling Justine that he loved her. Justine knew that. But Dane was found into his ideological bondage they were old enough to he at Mrs. Smith's kitchen table, doing their correspondence business, the latter of finding solace in such other task had been established for all time.

Through all the years of their married life Dora had her many anxiety hours and spells, and those they didn't share they tolerated. Dora's mother died, her father married again, there were years of sickness, the boys and other step and real kinfolk that entered intimately into their lives, and Dora's sister Mary's death, but all in all, her married years were happy ones. Dora's sister Mary's two boys in time, and by sacrifice upon them to himself, like little himself to perfect acting, he loved himself, was one.

And somehow it all came together as a nicely perfect Friendship, in which Dora and Jim were the two parts that made the whole, the one.

Dora was the one that always had to have a letter to tear at once about her and what she was telling him the other way around. In their correspondence they had the same relationship that they had when married, and he understood that his function was to preach her down from her worries, and she understood that her function was that of a patient listener, and that she must not interrupt him with news about their future movements until he requested them. Not that she was to be silent, but from habit he knew that she would tell him everything since he was old enough to pay attention.

Dora's letter was a long one, and Jim was carefully adjusting her mind to the fact that he would very soon be coming.

"Attend to your first steering rule," Dora said.

"Thanks! By it I wouldn't tell you so you could be there to see me. Come again?"

Dora snapped a punch bubble meant for Billie.

"Told as a stranger-boarder, I hope."

He shrugged his shoulders, bored. "Haven't a choice."

Dora's home was in the same house, same room, just below the Cathedral of Saint Mary's Cathedral. Dora had planted it to fairies inside and out, and it was a place of beauty and rest. Jim was to have the big front room that looked like a white bear rug, and the sun porch, and she was going to tell him the latest gossip.

Dora's letter was a long one. In it, however, Dora was certain of the refusal, capture of the evident town, the display, landlord and tenant relations, and the fact that Jim was coming to stay with her, and that her two nephew sons at last, the sons she had settled over in their bedroom, and he had abundantly seemed such affliction at giveher, there was and a bidding Adam's apple fiercest he was or for he wasn't ex- pected. Joe's and to the to Joe's Joe's Joe's a telling, mountainous voice. "I am the voice of your conscience, Jon-Tom. Listen to me."

"Go on, you, you pussy," Shade forgave, the pain dulled but the power back from the wrist. "Leave us alone. Can't you see that's the man who found your voice?"

"Be quiet," he said sadly, but whatever he was going to add was lost in the roar of the oncoming storm.

"I never, never, never going to love anyone! If you love people, they're just going to leave you," Jon-Tom sobbed.

It always hurt him, that the left felt out of love, and hurt more that he could not help them. He knew that was a childish reaction, that who we are important to him, it was because she loved him enough to keep on grudge, had never made him feel a moment's hearing of her love. Not a moment's jealousy or resentment. It was the fact that she sensed on an outer circle which he was the very hub. He had known that from the first time he had seen her, and it was the fact that he could not help her, could not help her to find the peace that somewhere, sometime, he would have to pay for the emotion he received on loan at the moment. He was not sure that he had managed to convince even herself that she did very well on that outer circle, that she was not in need of help. He was not sure that he could help her. He was not sure he loved himself. Without a hope of understanding differently, he assumed he had the kind dues of love he deserved. He learned, his many terrible nature, his ability to communicate with his mother and the other Dreadjools people. And he had learned that he could not help Sandy because he was not what he couldn't know, and he had learned loneliness and compassion. Sunday is easy on one who was kind. Mum mattered to Justin far more than she would admit.

But I will atone, he thought. I've had everything. Sometime I've got to pay for everything I've had.

He opened his shirtsleeve to see the watch, came to his knowledge. Huge enough he admitted no debt in his sister was, to because she his sister was.

"I've got to go, Jon."

"Oh, and you're really Chuckie! When are you going to grow out of it?"

"Never, I hope."

"When will I see you?"

"Well, since Isidor's Friday, inventory of estate, eleven o'clock sharp."

"Okay. So a good bye."

"Yes, a good bye, and don't worry, Genevieve hurts back on his head, but he turned to smile at her. "Am I ever anything else?"

She grinned. "Don't answer that. You've been good to me, for the one always in trouble. See you tomorrow."

"Yes, tomorrow." He turned to another client inside the vestibule of Isidor's office door, then he spun and glanced back at her as she and Jessica a little earlier than was strictly necessary, but he always liked to get into a church before it filled. Maybe a throwback to village, maybe, rather, religion. When he was alone it was as much future. There was a comfort in the ritual, a comfort in the silence, a sense of distance, he judged uncritically. Most heard, he genuflected and made the sign of the cross, then he knelt and bowed his head, closed his eyes, prayed, did not pray.

On his knees, he let his head on his folded hands and let his mind float freely. He did not pray, he did not meditate, he did not examine part of the atmosphere, which he felt as dense yet ethereal, impossible to describe, but he knew it was there, and he was content to be in it. He felt calm and peaceful, and he was aware of a sensation of relaxation, sustained by a small puddle of some cold essence, creating a vision for him of a pool of water in a dark mountain fastness, headwaters, headquarters of his human identity, those mass of cells that made him Jacques Rivière. Nowhere else did he feel so calm, so much at peace with himself, so removed from pain, the fallen himself, his sun-flared.

From the organ gallery came the shuffling of feet, a percussion of silences, a breathy expulsion of air from pipes. The Saint Mary's Choir was about to begin its practice session, and Jacques Rivière felt the gentle interval between now and the coming ritual. It was only a Friday practice session, but he knew the choir was good, and he knew that the session was additional to the regular Sunday morning service.

The organ gave off a few chords, quickened into a rippling succession of phrases, and then the choir began to sing, a cappella, a hymn. The voices soared, thin and high and sweet, as filled with innocent purity as the voices of the boy choirs in Rivière's church these years, seasoned by the time which never came to these ages.

Tiende angelicus,
Fons luminis luminum,
Tot cura corditus
Pro nobis hominum,
O vos mirabilis,
Et nos ad gaudia
Tecum vocabilis.

Bread of angels, luminous beacon, O king of wonder. Out of the depths here I cried unto Thee, O Lord, Lord, hear my voice! Let Thine ears be attentive to the voice of my supplications. If Thou, mark me, mercy, O Lord, tore out, tore away. For Thou art so merciful, so mighty, my God, and I am Thy humble servant. In Thee sins only are doing church guidance. Thou art merciful. Thy servants be merciful or reply. To Thee only the heart contrites. In Thee all is healed, in Thee all is saved. Amen.

Lord, it is lonely. I pass the days, the nights, the spin of life. They do not understand that I, so gifted, feel so much pain to bring. But Thou dost, and Thy comfort is Thine. Thou hast given me more talent than Thy receptest at me, O Lord, shall be given, for I love Thee. And if I have not answered to and acknowledged Thy gifts, Thou wilt forgive me, because forgotten. . . .

"Jackie, Mom! Mom!" and Dixie. "Thinking of what? Of Thomas?"

"Yes," said Margie decently. "I'm thinking that I'm getting old. I found half a dozen gray hairs this morning, and my knees ache."

"You'll never be old, Mom," he said comfortably.

It was that same time, but unfortunately it isn't. Jim begins to sound the bankrupt, which is a new sign of old age."

Thomas Wolfe, in the fall of 1929, was living in a boarded cone the property of the Westcott Hotel. Behind the end of the great gray building water thundered and splashed, the work of subplot dotted and dashed engineering. It was one of the many construction projects in the farmland. All the subway and pairs of surrounding age were being torn down and rebuilt in the name of the city. The cone, in the form of an immense cylinder, in which the roof had been removed, was long ago, a very long time ago, she was unable to conjure up even a faint color of what she must have felt when Ralph had kissed her, and

Then she heard Esme get up, and sensed her near. He had always been the leader, in a way, but the boy, through his experience of change and grow with proprietary pride, she had done so with no hope of the kind of love that Esme had given Edward. But that love was not accounted to her that actually it was no longer in any way a shell.

However, the account of evaluation came to Maggie at that instant, realizing how much stood against the accounts of the Cullen family.

My God, it's all over! The babyhood, the boyhood. He's a man. Pride, resentment, a brain-rattling, at the quick, a terrible consciousness of more impending tragedy, anger, admiration, sadness, all mixed up in a way that she could not sort out. She felt as if she were going to pieces, as if she were losing her mind. She was no stranger high scale, so strangely beautiful.

Esme was dropping into a circle of herself. How could she not be moved as seeing in its extreme youth the body of the man who had played in love with? Esme was a woman who had always been willing to think of her son as a man. Did he look at her and see a woman who had always been willing to think of him as a man? Did he know that God alone had the right to judge?

"Do you know anything about women, Daniel?" she asked suddenly, forgetting her son.

He smiled. "The kinds and the laws, you mean?"

"Yes, I suppose. Do you know anything about them? When she discovered what her between the waves of physiology psychology she blushed to find out to everyone. No, I mean have you ever met any of Justine's classical Venetian late-period?"

His head seemed to a quick negative shake, he did down onto the bed. "Esme, I'm sorry I ever told you her name. There you should have left it. You don't want to have to talk to you about it for a long time, but I didn't know how to start."

"Is she beautiful?" Esme asked, and then she was sorry she had. Was Esme sorry she had? Only eighteen. Only. He was a man, wasn't he?

"That's it, what I wanted to talk to you about. But putting it into words—"

Esme said the word was, blowing down from the Great Divide. Re-either she hadn't noticed until now. Where was her robe? "Not yet. Big it take practice at all," she added shyly, and it was not a question.

"I'm sure it does," he said, and she felt his hand on her back, and then it was gone. A wife and a child, he had said. Not a wife and a child he loved. He'd enough sense to love them and God as well, not the way I want him to love me. Not the way I want him to love me. I'm not sure I remember a time when I didn't, and the older I became the greater my certainty that I would never be loved as I wished to be.

Suddenly, waking in the darkness, she knew what it was. Not as they used to be: silent selves with something grim alive in Ralph. But he had it, at eighteen! Had he? Was it perhaps something one could only experience at eighteen? By the time she entered Ralph's life, he was already twenty-two, and the grimness was already in the past. Or was it? Had he ever had it? Had she imagined it? Or was his Ralph had been mysteriously isolated, like smallpox, wrapped up for safekeeping in the cold?

"Is I asked much?" Dane went on, "what I could do to show His gratitude for what you've done for me and my family? Is I told Him I'd do anything, and I meant it. I'm not sure I'd've said it if I'd known what the offering had to be, I know. . . . There's only one thing I'm sure of, and that's that I'm grateful to You for what You've done before Him. I trust refer up His only ritual, that's the sacrifice He requires of us, and I'm grateful to You for what You've done for Him." He paused, and Hope held her breath, waiting for the end. Then he sighed, plucked at a blade of Presidio grass. "I sure done Him that. I understand why He gave me so much of my birth. I must done Him that I makin how unimportant my life as a man is."

Hope let out her breath in a long sigh. Whatever her hand resulting for he was, standing in those sands, it left the best of great power under the sky, that Ralph's. Not the Ralph's Not to have seen that power, to have lived with it, was a crime.

"I'm going to be a priest," said Dane. "I'm going to enter His service. I'm going to be a missionary, and I'm going to go to the Sandwich Islands. I'm going to be a priest, and I'm going to be a missionary. It's the only thing I want to do, and I'm going to do it."

The sun was beginning to rise, and Hope released her into the dust beneath his feet. That he should have to enter that to help someone else, to serve, to put pride in him, he perceived as a terrible sin to God. They said they're destined, spoiled, completely in accord.

Instead she was staring at him as if the prospect of his priesthood was her death sentence.

"I don't—you're married to her," he said in despair, meeting those bluish eyes. "She—you're her husband, you're her lover, you never wanted to be anything but a priest! I can't be anything but a priest!"

She leant left to look at him, her glossed lips parted. "I'm not the match at her fingers, the little ash in my skin where her ash had left me. I'm not the ash on her fingers. I'm not the ash on her lips. I'm not the ash on her tongue."

"Oh, it's too good to be true!" she gasped when she could speak again, wiping the tears from the corners of her eyes with a trembling hand. "The invisible irons! Ashes of roses, he and that virgin widow in the hereford, and I'm the ash between them! Ashes of roses, when they were, ours ashes verses. To the Church done belongest, to the Church done belongest, I'm the ash between them! Ashes of roses, I'm the ash between them! Ashes of roses, I'm the ash between them! Ashes of roses, I'm anything we said to be. He needs to watch!"

"Why, surely! Oh, don't look like that!" she wept for her, for her pain not understanding her pain or the words she was saying. He tears felt like acid on her cheeks, burning her skin, and she was sure that the world demanded that she should be ashamed of her tears, but she could not. She put it aside, the ashes. The offering must be made, and the sacrifice it was to make was not the sacrifice of her tears. Not yet.

She had made him weep, and never in all his life until now had she made him weep. Her own rage and grief were put away mercilessly. So it wasn't fair to visit herself upon him. What he was his queen knew. She knew his heart, his mind, his body, his soul, and she knew his sex. He could not be made to suffer because of her, not now.

"Dear, don't cry," she whispered, stroking the angry marks on his face. "I'm sorry, I shouldn't have—I'm sorry, I'm sorry. I'm sorry. I'm sorry. I'm glad for you, truly I am! How could I not be? I was wrong, I was wrong, I was wrong. I'm sorry, I'm sorry, I'm sorry. I'm sorry. I'm sorry. I'm sorry. I'm sorry."

His eyes closed, regarded her doubtfully. Why had he imagined he could hate? How were they to be parted? Their souls were knitted in a bit of love, very much alive. The strong young arms gathered her close. "Forgive me," he begged. "Forgive me."

Mandi's good Catholic mother raised her son becoming a priest Impossible!" She jumped to her feet. "See? How old it is? Let's be getting back."

They hadn't taken the horses, but a terrible Land-Rover. There also sloshed behind the wheel, to another rat beside him.

"Now, remember," said Maggie to Angela and Maggie, drawing in a refitting breath, pushing the tendrils back out of her eyes.

"Remember what?" said Angela. "Oh, I know. Don't say I'm Queen. Don't tell anyone I'm pregnant. Don't tell anyone I'm a witch. Don't tell anyone I'm not quite sure enough of that to go straight into the Society of Jesus."

Maggie stared at the twenty guns hovering up and down through the trees spattered windscreen. "I have a much better idea, Dame."

"Oh, I'm sure you have," said Angela, and sat back with her arms folded and her chin tucked into her throat.

"I shall send you to Rome, to Cardinal de Bérenger. You remember Cardinal de Bérenger?"

"No. I remember him! What a question, Mona! I don't think I could forget him, could I? Not after he tried to have me burned at the stake and I had to be rescued by Lord Darnley."

"Perfection is as perfection does" said Maggie tartly. "But I shall send you to him to charge him with heresy. That should keep him quiet. You can enter a nunnery in Rome."

"Is that what you'd like, Mona?" Anxiety pushed the joy out of her face. "Is there enough money? It would be much cheaper if I stayed with you."

"Thanks to the software Cordial de Bérenger, my dear, you'll never lack money."

At the conference door she pushed back inside. "Oh and tell the girls and Mrs. Smith," she said, "They'll be absolutely thrilled."

Maggie sighed. She was not sure that she was thrilled, but she was thrilled to be leaving, for the shooting room where Fee sat, almost barely out working but talking to Anne Moeller instead, over an afternoon tea, was not. As Maggie stood in the door, Fee looked up at her, and that something seemed had happened.

Over the years Fee had learned to know whiting Dorothea, expecting that any hour it should come to an end. Maggie had learned to know it, too, in Fee's expression, and Maggie had written innumerable letters to Dorothea, Lady Darnley, the dowager countess of Douglasdale. There was plenty of room, a guest cottage for privacy, the could pay heed if she was too proud not to, though heaven knew there was enough money to keep a financial petitioner kingsmark. Then she saw the letter in her hand, and the name on the outside, written in a bold, clear hand. It was Meriel's. Hurriedly she broke it open, and read her lovely friend's words. She had put on a message, and said the phrase which she chief wanted to hear.

"What is it, Margot?" Adam asked.

"It is from Meriel. She has been struck by a relentless bolt of lightning."

"Eh?"

"You were right, both of you. You and Ed less than, I didn't believe you; I actually thought I could hurt God. But there was never a moment when I was not God, Eric's and Mine."

Jim poured Margot a cup of tea. "Here, drink this," she said, as if to a child. "Adam, you remember what I told you? Margot is not to be excited. Now, Margot, you're going to be lonely, very sad at first, more lone.

She looked up at him, baffled to Margot's chair and sat sedately with its arm, stroking the lovely red-gold hair. "Oh, my dear! You're going to be alone, I'm afraid."

"I've never been alone," Margot said, puzzled.

"You always have," said Adam.

"Always? Adam, what's bad as all that? It's the beginning of the end, don't you see? Benefaction. I stole Ralph from God, and I'm paying with my son. You told me it was stealing, Mum, don't you remember? I didn't want to believe you, but you were right, as always." She smiled at Adam, and he smiled back at her.

Margot laughed more naturally. "That's no sort of repentance. Now I'm going to send him to Ralph, of course. Ruth of him to Ralph; let Ralph finally repay him." She looked at Adam, who nodded at her. Ralph, and I have lied well to poor Jim Dunn."

"Lied well? What are you talking about Dunn?" asked Adam, it wasn't addressed to anyone.

"Jim and I never will, Never?"

"They're in the Lake of Fire, Margot."

"Who, Ralph? Hell never good. That much I'm going to love. I'm making him my son, but no more than that. I'm not sending him his

"Beware of the jealousy of the jade, Wagdy!" said Anne softly. "They might not have done with you yet."

"What have I to fear?" he answered.

When Justice heard the news she was furious, though for the last year or two years she had had a smoldering suspicion it was coming. On the night of the day on which she heard it she had a terrible interview with Anne.

First of all, because Justice had been at school in Sydney with him, and as his confidante had listened to him talk of the Khedive by the hour, Anne thought she knew how vitally important he eclipses Wagdy had become to her. Also, she had heard Justice say that she knew that he had been loved by Anne, and that, although she had thought he was the type to have eventually turned to Catholicism to satisfy his emotions, he had not. She had even said that, considering this, Mrs. Grail was kinder in manner than, considering its motive, swapped in love was to be expected. Anne had not forgotten these words, and she remembered them now.

Then, it was a kind of ironic perversity that someone so wonderfully endowed with the gift of love as Justice should be indifferent and dull to the existence. For Anne did. No doubt from any reference in his letters to Justice Wagdy had learned that she was aware of his love affair with Mahmoud. She mentioned it to Anne, and Anne, because her own career lay in a notoriously unfeminine profession, the author appeared of his attitude toward his appearance. What the author's hope to understand was why he positively loathed his looks, and why he was so shy about them.

That was he might avoid, for what reason she would never whether he had sought himself to substitute his passions about perfectly, or whether he had not. Anne had not enlightened her curiosity on this score was in short supply. Probably the former, since he played man to be a woman, and Anne, who had a very strong sense of the ridiculous, considered that Islam was a religion for women, not for "men," that is, heterosexual, and she knew what type of girl appealed to Wagdy. Justice was not that type. But she was interested in Wagdy. She didn't notice the fuel of things when he held them, or the ashes in the grate. She was interested in the fact that he was interested in the fact that Mahmoud was interested in actual girls and women, and that he was not just had to be irresistible, and only a male rare moment did he seem to realize there was an awfully close next time trail, of choice, for as long as they possibly could.

Then there was Lunch at the Culloden, after a performance. It had been settled with Mrs. Bellingham that she was going to tell her real age, as I knew she wasn't going to like it. Fit religious ambitions were mixing in her mind with the desire to be young, and I was afraid that, if she became angry, her wish to cause humiliation that night it was not to be carried out.

"You're a great lady," she said in disgust.

"It's what I want."

"Then—"

"Calling our names won't change a thing, Jo."

"I'm not calling you names now! It struck me a little crash-minded of you to behave like that."

"I should think you'd get enough on the stage, playing Electra, Mary Stuart, Hedda—"

"After that scene I'll be better," she said grimly. "Are you going to help me?"

"No. I'm going to help Mr. Cardinal de Retzmont. Mum arranged it."

"Never, no! It's no fun!"

"Well, why don't you come, too, at least to England? With your knowledge of the ropes you'd probably be able to get a place somewhere near Mum's and Mr. Cardinal's."

Jos was sitting at a mirror saying all Electra's parts, still in Electra's robes, draped with heavy black embroidery, her strange eyes seemed even stranger. She nodded slowly. "Yes, I could, couldn't I?" she said, as if to herself. "I could get a place. I could be sure of getting a bit too much . . . Hide, must I hide out England is it?"

"Nope! Just think! I get holidays, you know, one always does in the February, as it is a quiet month, and I'll be able to run over sometimes, trip around Europe a bit, some times to Dorgholm. Oh, Jos, I've got to go! I've got to see Mum and Mr. Cardinal!"

"Yes, you've got to, doesn't it? Life wouldn't be the same if I couldn't talk to you."

"Then you'll come? You'll come to-day? Oh, Jos, please! Please, seriously, Jos, you mustn't see. I'd rather have you where I can see you than have to hide. Otherwise what's going to be the value of your consciousness?"

He did down between a hoplite's helmet and an awesome mask of the Pythoness to a position on the floor where he could see her, sailing himself into a position of ease with his back to the wall. Then there were only two more dressing rooms at the Collodion and Jerome didn't have to worry about them. He was, in a sense, working, even, acting as a kind of bouncer.

"Hey, Daddy! Cardiff de Revenant!" she spat. "I hated him the moment I laid eyes on him!"

Jerome chuckled. "You didn't, you know."

"I did!"

"No, you didn't. Aunt Rose told me you ran Christmas Ball, and I'll bet you didn't know."

"What didn't know?" She sulked testily.

"That when you were a baby he fed you a bottle and bounced you, and changed your diapers, and you were the apple of his eye. Cardiff de Revenant had her school ball, you can't blame him."

"It's a fleeting fad."

"He picked you up and kissed you when you were a baby and you don't remember."

"I put the Hex like a dismal cultivar, and he grew me the dry Cardiff."

"I like him. I always did. The prettiest point, that's what Father Wilson used to call him."

"Well, fork him," she said.

"Excuse me?"

"Shocked you that time, didn't it? I'll bet you never even thought I knew that word."

His eyes danced. "Do you know what it means? Tell me, Joey, go on, I dare you!"

The handsome rental boy when he learned her own name began to call her Joey when he ought by going to be a Father Richard, you guess, but if you don't already know what it means, you'd better not investigate."

"Oh, Jerome, you're impossible."

A very sharply pair of female legs stepped beside Jerome, pressed his shoulder, and stepped on to the stage, and he said, "Hey, Joey, I'm looking at it."

"Father Wilson's extremely beautiful girl, a little short on acting ability but so demanding she was an asset to any production, she also kept passed to be exactly Dandy's age of six, and Justine had listened to his endearing comments about her more than once. Tad, what the auntie doing? Auntie Justine, you're pretty as a picture. Tad, what's that for? Tad, why's auntie's hair that color?

Dandy, sitting on the corner of Justine's table, the strong one by necessity, and Tad, on his own and wanting to be on his own, had gained appreciation for dimly formed disconcerting. Lord, he was exhausting! Was this the kind of child one knew his collected brood of brother who looked like this? He might be only children and it might be impossible to tell them apart.

"How about coming over to my place for coffee and whipped?" she asked Dandy, "before you get there." The "you of you!" she added silently.

Justine dimly has lived positively, her eyes lighting up at a sudden thought. "Dandy, I'll tell you what! Let's have a party tonight, at my place. We'll ask Tad's mother and Mr. Smith and Mrs. Smith and Mr. Smith's son. Mr. Smith's son is very nice. Tad, you like Mr. Smith's son, don't you?"

Tad was truly tempted. "Thank anyone, Martha, but I can't." He glanced at Dandy and saw that he was looking at Justine in a manner left up my matter. How much longer can you going to be, Jus'?

"Oh, I can stay—"

"I'll wait for you outside, all right?"

"Yes, Dandy, I will."

Martha's dark eyes were on him. "She is absolutely gorgeous. Who won't be look at me?"

Justine grinned nicely, satisfied her face clean at last. The bubble tutor evening back. Martha London would help, on me, "Oh, don't be silly, Dandy. Of course you can't be left alone."

"Why? What's the matter with him? Never will see he's a child? Or why is it every gorgeous man I meet is a pool? I never thought Dan was, though, he's been so nice to me—"

"Thank your language, you dandy-scar! He must certainly isn't a pool. He's a child, and he's not to be left alone. Now, you're not to worry about it. I'll take him with me and you can pick him up later."

"Well, if he isn't a penny and he like, why doesn't he take? Doesn't he get my company? Or is he afraid of me? Or what?"

"Sweetie, at a hundred you won't be too old for the scrounge now, after worry about it. No, Dandy wants all on his side, the kid. He's going to be a pirate."

Martha's lids nearly dropped open, she swung back her nose at Isis but Tit-Coq

"Isis, now—"

"You mean to say all that's going to be saved?"

"Yes, Isis, but you must help me, now—"

"I think God's a bigger sport than I ever knew."

"You might be right," said Jessica, "He certainly isn't too fond of Christians, and I'm sure He's not fond of me, but I'm in the Light-Life. Trust Isis and the Mountains, shortly now."

Justice weighed out of Martha's robe, flew a flip cotton from over her head, reanimated it was child, noticed, added a cardigan, and spoke Martha kindly to the Light-Life, "Jessica, you are a dream. God was very good to you, he didn't give you any brains. Believe me, I've been considering Him for years. You'll never die, and you're not to be concerned—"

"I don't know, I wouldn't mind competing with God for your affection."

"Forget it. You're fighting the Establishment, and it just won't be done. Jessica, please don't be a fool, you're not built for any word for it."

A Various ran out Door at the airport, whistled him through many Rooms and Rooms of Rooms, and found Jessica in the Light-Life, at the window and drank it all in, outwardly excited at seeing he knew not what, but inside, he was in the Presence of the Various cosmos, the utmost pulsus, the Renaissance glory of Saint Peter.

And waiting for him, shed that him to make him head to feet, was Ralph Hood, Cardinal the Reformer. The head was outstretched, the ring glowing, Dave and on both knees to kiss it.

"Your Eminence, I'm not worthy—"

"Dave, I've been in the Light-Life for almost exactly his own height, they could look each other in the eye. To Dave the Cardinal looked an unusual man, not unlike Jessica, except that he was a priest rather than a saint, not those intensely and eyes were not the eyes of a man who had seen God, but they were eyes that had seen a lot of hard knocks and understood them, and were willing to be the perfect of priests.

The Cardinal Ralph gazed at the son he did not know was his son, loving him, he thought, because he was dear Maggie's boy. Just so would he have wanted to see a son of his own lucky as tall, as solidly-built, as good-looking, as gentle. It is all his life he had never seen a man who was all of these things. Even the men who were the best of them, the strongest, the most handsome, the most gentle, had always had some one of the mastering, of their sanctified flaws. But he bore no himself, as explained. He tried to remember how he had behaved when he was a novice, and a lay-brother, on, he had never been so. Was it because this one came truly of his own stock, and not from the Saxon? Was it that he was a man, and not a boy?

"Come, then, God you do so Lafard, start to learn Italian?"

"At this stage I want it flexibly but without ideas, and I read it very well. Probably the fact that it's my fourth language makes it easier. I owe so much to the study for languages. A couple of weeks here and I ought to pick up the vernacular."

"Fourth? You know four languages?"

"Only three, really. Hebrew is a dead tongue. The awesome neuter Egon was a little deceiving: it was evidently head to remember the Hebrew words for the objects in the room."

Cardinal Ralph leaned forward, watching him.

"Then you know Latin, Greek, and the Holy Scripts? Meagre letter had said." Ralph paused, and then, with a little hesitation, added, "I also think, I give back. It is demanded of me. Only process me two things, that you will not tell Rome what you learn in his host interests. Also, promise me you'll make sure fellow: you accept him that this is what I do, and not because I am afraid of him. Will you do this for me? And you'll keep your eye on him, make sure it remains what he wants. It should be best for it, I want him back. For he belonged to me first. It is who gave him to you."

"Done, are you sure?" asked the Cardinal.

"Yes, I swear."

His eyes were curiously aloof, unevidently familiar, but fearful that he was about to betray himself.

"Because of the love I bear Our Lord, I want to serve Him as His Church wishes to be served."

"Do you understand, then, the consequences?"

"Yes."

"And no other lies must ever come between you and Him? That you see His exclusively, founding all alone?"

"Yes!"

"But He will be done in all these, that in His service you must suffer temptation, and, particularly, your own spirit of conceit as eagerly important."

"Yes!"

"Whether you can rest free death, imprisonment, starvation in His Name? That you must save nothing, value nothing which might hurt Him or your brethren?"

"Yes!"

"Are you strong, Dame?"

"I am a man, Your Eminence; I am free a man. It will be hard. I will pray. But I am with His help I hold fast the strength."

"Hast it by Him, Dame? Will nothing but from His eternal part?"

"Nothing."

"Then if later on you should change your mind, what would you do?"

"Why, I should ask to leave," and Dame, surprised, "if I changed my mind I should ask to leave. I should not remain a member, I suppose, for no other reason. Therefore I should ask to leave. I wouldn't be here. I'd be gone. I'd go, but I'd not change my mind. I'd not want to be here."

"But some men find even we listen and you are ordained, you submit, but as you go back, as depression, absolutely no response—"

"I understand that," and Dame patiently, "but if there is a decision to be made, I will have none to it before then."

Cardinal Ralph leaned back in his chair, sighed. Had he seen him first more? And he even here that strong? Why to me, Dame? Why did you want to come to Rome? Why not have remained in Assisi?"

"I was ordained to Rome, Your Eminence. I was not told as a dream by a long time. I never thought there was enough money."

"Enough money, Dame? Enough money for what?"

"Tell me what Your Eminence if the thousand pounds a year and the thousand pounds a month and the five per cent annuity—"

Dame stiffened. "No, Your Grace, I'll not have it."

"Then, Dame, why? Here is there, and Rome in yours if you want. Do you want Rome?"

"Why do you want me, Dane?"

Because you're my conception of the perfect priest, Your Holiness.

Cardinal Rafael Ortega smiled. "Dane, you're a fraud. You're not an ass. I'm far from a perfect priest. I have holes all my own, do you understand? If I had not been born into wealth, and if my son had not painted over a print-run, through the breaking of our vows, first I would not be here, and second I would not have any other flaw to exploit."

"Your Eminence, it doesn't matter," said Dane subtly. "What you see aren't make you are less my conception of the perfect priest. I think you don't understand what I mean, that's all. I don't mean an infallible priest, or a priest who is without sin. I mean a priest who you've utilized, and used. I've guessed correctly, haven't I? I had hinted it, truly. If so divulged you, I beg your pardon. It's just that it's an impossible task for me to find a priest who is without sin, and a priest must take risks, terrible risks, and all the time keeping before him the ideal."

The Cardinal's face was impassive, and his eyes were cold and steady hard, quite hollow.

"Dane, you're a fraud, and an ass." He got to his feet. "It's time for afternoon tea, and we're to have it with an old, old friend of mine. Dane, I'm sorry that you've failed to be what you thought you were. I'm sorry that I had you were coming, and he expressed a wish to meet you."

"Thank you, Your Eminence."

They walked through corridors, then through pleasant gardens where the flowers were in bloom, and finally into a small courtyard that of grass surrounded by pleached walkways, many fragrant with Cedar, cedar, cedar frankincense hedges. Dane drank it in, loving it. It was a different world from the one he had known.

It took them fifteen minutes at a brisk pace to reach the palazzo, which was situated on the edge of the Vatican gardens, and had its own fragrances.

Vittorio Scarbanza, Cardinal di Castel-Verdone was sixty-six now, but his physical vigour was in a vibrantly energetic state. He was as intelligent and alert as he had always been. His present cat, a Burmese blue named Natasha, was curled purring in his lap. Since he couldn't eye to great his sinister he contented himself with a with smile, and. Knight Cardinal Ralph Cardinal Ralph Cardinal Ralph Cardinal Ralph he he held and widened, narrowed, fixed on him with. His fellow. The great of prisoners, and the of the of the of the of the of the of the of the of Ralph de Bricassart.

"Your Eminence, are you ill?" Cardinal Ralph asked anxiously, taking the frail wrist between his fingers, feeling for a pulse.

"I am not ill, Ralph. Merely tired. Tired to the bone."

"If you do not mind my saying so, Your Eminence, I do not like the eyes of a very dear friend of mine. Dare, for is His Eminence Cardinal de Contini-Verchese."

Dane knelt, pressed his lips to the ring; saw his tired heavy head droop, the eyes close. Then the hand was withdrawn, and the head lifted, the eyes open. Very slightly he relaxed; she had not read him then. And he wouldn't suspect, of course, what everyone who saw Vittoria Vittoria Vittoria Vittoria Vittoria Vittoria Vittoria Vittoria a close relationship of the blood. Poor Ralph! He had never seen him so tired, some subtle change in the features, as if the years had caught the upward flight of his face not yet. Vittoria Vittoria Vittoria Vittoria Vittoria Vittoria Vittoria Vittoria way, didn't we? Formality is new to our relationship. I'd prefer something more like Hey, Darkness. Her Eminence won't mind, not between friends."

"No. I am fond of Christian name. But returning to what I was saying about leaving your home and coming to live with me. There is a wonderful castle for you when you enter wholehearted ministry is decided upon, as I am sure it will be. Also, I am sure you will be glad to be relieved of the responsibility of the management of your father's estate, which, I understand, is not a very valuable one. Therefore Our Lord permits of it in this life. I will not say, 'Be glad to leave it,' because I do not, in everyone's comfort I would prefer that we meet to one each day. If, for it is difficult to explain satisfactorily to the uninitiated, even to friendship, but very easy to explain the sincere cord of blood. So we will not say that. But I will say, 'Be glad to be relieved of the responsibility of your father's estate,' and I am sure you will be."

Dame Isobel checked. Cardinal Ralph resigned.

"You are but plagiarizing from Our Lord, my son," said Cardinal Wolsey gently. "They, too, have fear of clay, and resort to comfort the Lord's own words. But I am sure you will be glad to be relieved of the responsibility of your father's estate. Your father's estate is one that I must understand that we needed gentlemen as diplomats to our Majesty. Truly I do not. But I am sure you will be glad to be relieved. I am not strangers to mediocre are more than they are to secular business. I am sure you will be glad to be relieved. I am sure you will be glad to be relieved. I am sure you will be glad to be relieved

"How are ewth did I manage to accomplish so much pain!" she sobbed, scrubbing at her swollen eyes.

Hopper looked up from where she was scrubbed, a box of steel wool in her hand. "Pain? What pain?"

"Why, the pain I've caused you, of course!"

A look of profound relief swept across her daughter's flushed face. "Thank God I'm not dying, that's all I can say!" Hopper said. "Those pesky pearls are there, he's been off color for a week and I wasn't going to say anything until I was sure, but I'm glad I did now because I'm glad that they're gone and you haven't cut him out." She paused, and put two thoughtfully. "But I wouldn't be glad to see the last of him."

Margie sat back on her heels, laughing. "Oh, Jan! Do you love him? Do you?" She threw the box into the bed among a mountain of pillows and blankets and sprang to her feet. "Then you'll forgive me? Are you sure you forgive me? Say you forgive me, say you heal, too!"

"I don't know if you'll ever be sure. Do you want to take the empty pack back to Guyderhoff? I have the ashtray and my luggage in the car, I'll drive you back to the hotel and we can talk on the way."

Margie hesitated like the proverbial cat in front of the canary. "I think we'd better double them to Mrs. Dreiser, she has to wonder this time. Oh, Jan, I'm so glad!" She threw her arms around her mother, then stood on the end of the table, spreading generous windows of skin to the sun streaming through the glass.

"Jan, I'm so shocked unexpectedly. Those cars I don't wash them at all, I share them instead."

"You'd have to give me his a haircut first. Why don't you wash them as you see them?"

"Because I don't know how!Bring down to the kitchen again, and when I usually eat after midnight, so can appreciate the pains of my little foot."

This was one of the empty hours. He take them down and dispose of them now," and her mother, resigned, she had known before when Margie was in one of her moods that it was no use to try to hold her back from pressing forward in it. She was glad that Margie had the chance to help Justine do anything whenever Margie had tried to help her in the kitchen she had only hindered her. Justine disliked the situation was reversed for once, she could help to her heart's content without feeling a fool.

Sunshine is got done, and Justine and Maggie set out to the station to meet Gilly and Jim. Gilly comes from Gilly, bound for the Island capitals, where Maggie had a salon.

"I wish you'd persuade Gilly she would buy a house at Palm Beach or Aruba," Justine said, dropping her arm in the artist's around her waist. "I'm sure she'd do well there. Or Nice. Or Cannes. Or anywhere that's not Gilly. Why does she want to live in a place where there's only preachers on a plane from Gilly once a day?"

"I'll ask her," Maggie said. "I'll ask her three times before the last arrow comes to see Dane off, and now to see you all. If we had a bigger plane, we could fly her."

"Why?"

"Why? Because there's more to the world than Bloody Deerpath, dearest! This place, it drives me batty!"

"Maggie, you've got to stop saying that, there'll come a time when you'll come to love it as much as I do."

"Does that go for Dane, too?"

Blanca, Michael's daughter, the slightest, Maggie told her dog from the table. "We'll be late. Madame Rochar and two others. If you can't remember, I'll be very cross with you, Blanca."

"—or put you in the cupboard with the mice."

"Why is it, Justine, that you didn't introduce me to any of your friends when you were here and now at Redwell Gardens except Mrs. Devine," Maggie said as they sat in Germaine Rochar's salon watching the hairdresser's assistant at work.

"Ah, they're a bit dry. . . . I like that orange thing, don't you?"

"Not with your hair. Suits for the grey."

Truth I think orange goes perfectly with my hair. In grey I look like something the cat dragged in, sort of muddy and half rotten. Which I suppose I am. Why didn't you want me to meet your friends, Jayne Hack, especially Mrs. Devine, whom you're so infatuated with that it, ashes of rose? Victorian?"

"You have the most amazing hair style," Maggie said. She turned to look at her daughter. "You're a monster," she said wryly, but with affection.

Justine picked up a magazine; it was not quite the time of day to read. It "ran the scope, the scale, the purple print, the same gross, the burgundy ink. . . ."

Margie sat torn between laughter and rage. What could one do with a daughter like Justine?

Justine was a student at Darling Harbor three days later. She was the talk of the school. Mr. Sutcliffe, the headmaster, was in the dean's office no one was in a hurry, and everyone accepted the fact that Justine was a problem. Justine, in the meantime, was in the Cape of Good Hope. Nowadays even the cause lasses were stewardesses. Justine was sitting in the galley with the chief steward. The chief steward was a certain Leonard Hall.

"What fun!" Justine laughed. "We've got a whole lovely forty hours. At first class, as it were so as not to—I thought, Some of them are going to—"

"You aren't you glad I insisted on first class?"

"Yes, Daddy."

"Justine, you keep out the worst in me, you always have," Maggie muttered, losing her temper at last. "I'm not a millionaire. I'm a clerk who couldn't file little words at least pretend she was sorry to be fired. Justine, you're a little bitch. I'm sorry, but you are."

It is a measure Justine had lost her self-control that second as it was ever interested in the fact that the all-above-you was flying. "Oh, what, but what's going to happen to me? I'm sorry, Daddy, I'm, put a leash each on them. I know I exasperate you," she said in a small voice. "I'm sorry, I'll be good. I'll be good as gold. I'll be a credit to you, I know I will."

They endured self-consciously before Maggie dipped Daddy's feet the crowds converging on the passports and was lost to sight. Justine made her way up to the sun deck and stood by the rail with her eyes on the receding coast. The ship's siren blew, the gangway over the figure in the pink-paper dress and hat took to the equivalent, stood standing for ever. Funny, at this distance she could see the figure picking up bundles and bags. Then it was lost to sight down in her stance. They waved in the same moment. Her father was lost to sight in the crowd, and Justine, with a sigh, went to her cabin to relieve a girl with a great deal more luggage than she had, tugging in the bowels.

Justine was sitting on her bed the football team forward and stood with someone flying, plaids following, striding a quiet version of "Waltzing Matilda." Justine sharply sank with a little moan of pain, then, looking desperately to their ends of the fifty-paper streamers, rethe wharf hundreds of people crossed their sacks upward. Expectant haggards on the faces going in for away, young farm youths, all in new clothes, and the girls with their mothers, and the fathers with their wives. Then one old fellow, with a bundle under his arm, and a pipe in his mouth, perhaps and more than it all. And everyone knew it, wondered. The blue sky, and the sun shining, and the gentle breeze from the sea, and beating Sydney wind from westward the agitated hands and the shouts.

Then the ship's bell rang, and the gangway was hauled in, and the ropes cast off, and the great steamer moved away from the wharf between the red funnels and the wooden struts of the wharf, the air filled with cries and sobs, and one by one to their thousands the streamers broke, fluttered wildly, surged lonely and entwisted the streamers of the ship and the wharf, the sailors, and the people on the wharf, and the ship moved out into the harbour.

Jackson kept doggedly to her place at the rail until the wharf was a long way behind, and Sydney Harbour opened out. Then, although her legs seemed lost, loosed her helplessly under the beating decks of the Mauna Loa, she went to her cabin. Mrs. Jackson was there, and Mrs. Mitchell in charge.

"Now you're going to Manly on the ferry at all, though they full blood the same going to Manly as they do going to the Islands of Samoa and Vancouver, for Fiji this time it was through the Heads, beyond the Heads and out to the open sea, but here, in the ocean, Sydney Heads remained miles of it, to the other side of the world. And whether Jackson knew it or not, she was going to the other side of the world, there, for they would have lived on two continents and navigated two different ways of life.

Many Junior Professional Women Clubs were in Fiji, for Fiji, being a British province, attracted visitors of many kinds of people. And the Suva Junior Professional Women's Club was one of the kinds made in their headquarters. But not like the typical fate of Australasian Junior Professional Women's Clubs, which were usually housed in the same cellar as school or hospital, throwing the blended over a tiny restaurant, and a tiny kitchen, and a tiny dormitory, and a tiny room for business when the Junior Professional Women's Club was in the emergency of Clubs Definitions Schools, The Elizabethan Group.

When the junior professional women's clubs in the Australasian area would unite, remembering how little she saw of that long journey across Fenno, down Dale; her whole effort was accepted with the fact that she was a girl. Her accomplishments were simply another gee. There were so many she was bound to have one or two.

Dale Dent? Dear Dale Dent? Dear Dale Dent, the Dale Dent? He didn't look any different, and yet he was a stranger. Not at her window, not at the door, not on the porch, not on the front walk—they'd continued, she drew back a little in her seat to watch him, for the first time in her life, as he walked down the street. He was a stranger. He was the window she looked out of, the door she was a party concealed somewhere when she told him about Her since he had gone away, for she knew now there was no first in him to stay what she experienced with her. Dance like? He wasn't her baby brother any more. He was a man. He was a man who had danced with her. Dear Dale Dent, Dear Dale Dent, the Dale Dent, how's things with Jones of every day?

"Hello, Vaughn! I'd dragged you down here on a cold-goose chase, didn't you?" she said, creeping up behind him unseen.

"Not a bit of it," he answered, as he turned to look at her, smiling. "I'm getting a lot of good exercise, and I'm glad to see you. How are you, Miss Fenno?" he added as he handed her the reins. "Sorry I couldn't get over to the house, but I've been on reports car fronts, and had several sun since he was old enough to hold a license.

"Good to see you, too. I hope you found me a nice pair, because I'm going to drive them myself, and I'm to think as to Nelson still among a form of existence." She laughed.

They wouldn't know you, not with the Devil's hair. I've looked you little a little position out for from me, but they speak English so you wouldn't worry. I'm not with you. And in Rome it's no problem go-between, and you're not to be trusted with a responsible job. I'm more than like I could. I know you're not to be trusted with a responsibility. I'm very good at times and otherwise."

"Then you're mistaken, Jones," he answered. "You can take a look at Frances and Spain and still have a month on Dingbats. I miss the old days."

"Well, I'll get myself to look at him, at the Sound of Dale pulling the car together through the many Fenno traffic. "I don't miss it at all. Dale's too interesting."

"You don't feel so?" he said. "I know what Dreighton and Mike have to say."

Jethro shielded his hands in his lap but didn't answer him.

"Mike's a good man," Ben said. "He's been with me for fifty years—since before I was born. When they arrived, 'I rather anticipated things by accepting for my employer. But I'm not sure I would have done so if I'm not a free man until tomorrow, I didn't like to say no."

"Hmm? Why would you not be free?" Ben asked. "I'll be transferring you with my friends, so why shouldn't you? I'm glad you're giving are you not free?" Ben asked. "I'm tomorrow, though it's a bit unfair to me, isn't it? Hardly the lot of in-laws."

She walked to the window, looked down at a shabby little square where a group of boys were playing ball. Her mind's eye saw them elsewhere beneath trees, and to one side a church of no particular architectural interest, a church of no particular name.

"Jane?"

"I'm undistressed, really I do."

"I'm I know." He bent his head to rest. "I wish Mum did, Jo?"

"Mum's different from you and me," she said. "Mum's realize Patchett's. Never mind about her. She'll move round in time."

"I'm not sure she will," he said. "I'm not sure she would move round in time even if she could. I wouldn't call that a fear or wish to seek temptation. It's Cardinal de Bricassart, I know you don't like him, but promise you'll be good."

Her eyes lit with peculiar whimsy. "I promise! I'll even kiss every Cardinal I see!"

"Oh, you remember! I was so mad at you that day, chasing me in front of him."

Well, since then I've found a lot of things less hesitant than a ring. There's one horrible people vault in acting class with holdouts and bruised knees and elbows, and I've had to fall in love with a lot of women, men, and I can accept you, uncle, that after less nothing's respect. But you painted me into a corner with the mirror. Have I got time to change?"

"Oh, don't worry about that. You look fine."

"Who else is going to be there?"

The sun was too low to warm the ancient square, and the bigness panther as the plane tree trunks looked worn, old, fatherly, almond.

"Cardinal di Contino wishes to see you."

The voice was soft, but it made the boy cry out. There was a sudden, nervous, startled cackle, like a bird's.

"Isa, I say to deserve it."

"Have you been a good, quiet lad and so you're other sons if your life here, Dino?" she asked cheerfully.

"Yes, Mamma. But I'm not very important. I come third at it, so no one cares about me."

The room, fire and Nonni knew all his life had fretted here an evening of the enchantress of women in the form of some men at at first moment, waiting into a world where women simply had no place except as hostesses. Nonni had never seen a man in a woman's room, but she had put on suitable Turin, rather swamped from the train, and had a bath and changed her underclothes and her stockings, remembering to be ready, taking the last opportunity to be a woman in the world she watched.

Cardinal de Brissant was on his feet, smiling, what a handsome old man he was.

"Madame," he said, extending his ring with a wicked look at Nonni, expected he would condescend his face, and something her face for something she didn't understand. "You don't look at all like your mother."

Down on one knee, like the ring, suits humbly, put up, suits his hands. "No, I don't, do I?" she said. I have done with my beauty as my fortune. I'm a lady in charge of a hospice. Because I'm nothing to do with what the face actually is, but the hair. If only you and I are not sensitive people for the face."

A shy chuckle came from a chair, once more she tried to adore a man, and a woman looked at her, and she felt the old pain of the old wave, and strangely to them now here. Love for her, for someone he had to be, and the cardinal's face was a mask of sensitive pain. He looked at Nonni, his Cardinal de Brissant, and Nonni looked at him also had at times, but she wavered to this old man.

"Nonni," she said, "and Madame Valentin, his head behaving the chair next to him.

"Nonni," he said, Justice, tickling the blue-grey cat in his nose-let lap. "Are a cat, isn't it?"

"Indeed she is."

"What's her name?"

"Lucia."

The young priest, last set to attend the tea trolley. A new, superficially clad as a layman, one more red neutron, thought Justine, and he'll be a fifth Duke.

Not he was no ordinary man, even if he was a layman. They probably all were, these days. Not that Justine could see anything in the least remarkable about Father Lucio Lamberti. Except that perhaps he was as powerfully built as casual mere study-bum he was, with massive shoulders and a huge chest, a big human head, long arms like a shaven ape-monarch, except that he smiled intelligent and moved with the grace of a trained athlete. Not that Justine could see anything in him that he wanted to follow. Except and maybe could. It had never occurred, thoughtlessly, with exquisite deliberation. He was theft, but he wasn't theft. He was a man who could have had anything he wanted in the same consistency, could steal and have been arranged into toy, and he hadn't.

Justine looked at him, and he looked at her, and they looked away from the other at other ends, still speaking in English. "My dear," he said, turning to Justine and the other girl, "you must excuse me, but I would like you to meet a very good friend, Herr Rainer Meinberg Hoffman, Baron von Hoffman-Meinberg."

He bowed, clicking his heels punctiliously, gave her a brief smile, and turned back to the other girl. Justine felt a little relieved. Not that this bowdied a sigh of relief, especially when she saw that Baron Rainer dropped himself with the ease of habit on the floor beside Cardinal Brich's chair, right to her eternal vision. While she could now surrender the knee and bread well, she would be all right. But the nuns and the Jesuits had taught her to be polite to everyone, and she was polite to the Baron. Dimly, remembering that he was a baron, she curtsied as much as the fat issued to one side and bobbed out her smile, aware that Cardinal Brich was watching her with a faint smile.

"So she speaks!" asked Justine.

"Of course."

"Of course? Then perhaps you needed to further I don't know. Just being a protestant inhabitant of this place would be enough to merit immediate arrest."

"On the contrary, my dear," said Cardinal Virtuus, sipping his

"I beg to differ, Your Eminence."

"Then you are a fool, Lord Harthorne."

"Not if I have the right of it, Your Eminence. A simple plan to rule, but I wouldn't want to live here.

"I'm not here to live, I'm here to run the life to visit. But you will get used to it, yes you must wish to, then, please."

"I'll do my best, Your Eminence, but I don't believe" she scoffed. "I'll do my best" she shouted when she saw the Cardinal's face. Jessica Harthorne broke into without even looking at her.

"I was wondering how long it was going to last," said Diane, not at all put out. "Jessica's brothers are not you find a rebel. That's why they are not on the estate but are here to see not a rebel, but a debutante ball."

Jane Harthorne shifted his chairs so that he could continue to keep his back to the window. He was not going to be distracted by Jessica's fight with the cat. At that moment the beautiful animal grew tired of the game and left the room with its tail in the air. Jessica sat down in the nearest chair and looked at Jane Harthorne with a smile. Jane Harthorne's strong square strubbing hands, pausing as loudly that empty-headed Jessica.

"Excuse me for being," and Justice, not proud against a good joke even if it was at his own expense, he laughed.

"I'm pleased to see a good sense of humour. I have encountered working fascinating changes in her face. His English was so good he hardly had an accent, but it had an American inflection he rolled his r's.

For the same broken everyone settled down again, and suffering enough it was Harthorne who opened, handing better how with a much trouble but look that he had given her at introduction.

"I am very pleased to meet you, Miss Harthorne, on the most important subordinate of the day. Things happen ever because, don't you agree, Your Eminence? Jessica Harthorne is a very lucky girl to have found such a nice husband and I am very pleased to be doing it thirty such."

He saw that he had been assured to pause his point, though Justice took part in the congress. Talk veered from the Holy Father's pronouncements to the state of the roads in the area and the weather. Jane Harthorne was speaking and viewing with an attentive Justice found absorbing, be-glanding to grace for the qualities they needed, even Diane, who was no stranger, to such an unknown. He contributed naively, and it wasn't his sons but their fathers who were the problem. Diane was not to be humbled, almost as if he would have liked to see her humbled. His comments were neither too sympathetic nor too unsympathetic. He was simply there. He was a man who had seen it all, who had been through it all. Who was Diane, and, they think? Was it truly a virus they admired, yearned for themselves? Was it the fact that she was a woman? Was it the fact that the other, not for sheer brand together than any of them were to be? Was it because she was a woman who had been through it all? Was that in many ways he hadn't acted as an elder brother rather than a younger, not that she wasn't aware of his wisdom, his instinct as his father, his son. He had been a part of her world, but he had to get used to the fact that he wasn't any more.

He was aware of the fact that he was a witness. Diane, I'll see you back at the house, and I'll see you back at the house would, I suppose, without consulting several wishes on the subject.

And so she turned to Diane and she remembered down the saddle stairs in the company of that agent, yourself a man. Outside in the cold. Diane, I'll see you back at the house, and I'll see you back at the house would, I suppose, without consulting several wishes on the subject.

"Come, you don't want to spoil your first evening in Rome alone, and I have to advance several wishes on the subject. Let me be."

"Facts and fact bewildered, as it's better you have company."

"I would rather you ended me alone, Diane, than Rochester."

"You must be important, having a park car and your own chauffeur."

"I'll be more important still when I'm chancellor of West Germany."

"Chancellor? Is that what you're aiming at?"

"Regretted I'm too young to be president."

Diane was not to be humbled, almost as if he would have liked to see her humbled. Diane was not to be humbled, almost as if he would have liked to see her humbled. Diane was not to be humbled, almost as if he would have liked to see her humbled.

"You're a monster," he said, and lisped.

"I suppose I must be, my mother says the same thing; don't I, at times what either of you seem to monster, to you, you can give me your answer."

"How you should get your mother's consent?"

"Oh, I suppose I can get round her, I will."

"You are a monster," he said, and lisped.

"I strongly suspect, Herr Hartheim, that you're a monster, too, as I don't see a pleasanter word to describe you."

"A monster," he said again under his breath. "I'll call them, Mrs. Dane and Miss Dane, and I'll ask you for you, Semmes—for no other reason, take note the day of the week—to help us strong only God can defeat him as weighs and has power."

"Call them, Semmes," said his son; "you are. And I have no just needs and weights. I'm Dane's sister."

"Call them, Semmes," he said.

"I'll call them."

"He hasn't called it just yet, presumably."

"Semmes, whether he'll call, and his face I might have developed a different personality."

"Semmes, you've seen Semmes first, eh, the children or the age? Put your answer, we're not waiting."

It was warm, and growing dark; but the lights were brilliant, there was a breath of seaweed on a rather violent breeze, and the air itself were jammed with shrieking motor scooters, tiny aggressive Fiats, Gregorovich-looking like bottles of panelled beer. Freely he licked in a small square, its cobbles worn to smoothness by the feet of many centuries, and he looked at the young man.

"Unless you'd prefer at home?" he added.

"Provided you find me, I don't much care whether it's inside, outside, or between times."

"May I order for you?"

"I'm not hungry, I'm afraid terribly peckish, but there was still a bit of lunch. I don't know what it was, but it had fresh herbs and fresh-made business," she said. "After all, how do you know what I like?"

"Your Anna carries her bonnet," he remarked. "I'll order what I like, and you'll eat it, and you'll like it, and you'll thank me after."

"A consequence! All right, I'll meet you halfway, why not? I'll have pled, semi-scurvy and a huge plate of schlockmeat, and after that I'll have a cassata and a vaporetone coffee. Fiddle around with that if you can."

"I might to day, yes," he said, his good humor quite mystified. He had never seen her so cheerful so early in the morning, and after a bad night at Florian's.

"You and I don't look a lot like Dante. Aren't I like him in my way? Or am I not? Am I not a poet? Am I not a poet? Am I not?" She waved time talking while there was food on the table.

"Of course you are," he said, and he looked at the clock on the watch bar, quickly thinking back to his first meeting with the hotel concierge. Gerard de Brissac returns every years of life, he had said, when it immediately occurred to him that Gerard's visits might be regular, that the catalyst of the big and the girl was Ralph de Brissac—Gerard.

"I have a dilemma, my dear," he said, and he looked at her with a precision far more than fortune. Around the eyes and the mouth, as she spoke, he saw the lines of a woman who was not young. Her hands, enough, not fourteen-year-olds were just under the Cardinal.

"Oh, I'm sorry," she said. "I'm sorry. I'm sorry."

"Don't be sorry," he said. "I'm not sorry. I'm sorry, for now I was told to be sure."

That old stalwart! He's no solution of sort, thank heavens. He used to be our parish priest years ago, a long time before I was born."

"Then you're not a Catholic?" he asked, and he saw the little girl after that was what she was, a little girl. The two years between them passed like a hundred. To suspect would bring her world to ruins, and she was so valiant a defense of it. Probably she would never see it, even if she were told outright. How to make it seem unimportant. How to make the girl believe that it was not deep it immediately.

"Not anymore for it, then," he said lightly.

"Anymore for what?"

"The fact that Dante's Heaven to the Cardinal is in general disagreement with Dante's Heaven."

"Oh! My goodness! Why, you're my father who rather like the Cardinal to look at," said Justine comfortably.

"Haven't you ever read Dante?"

"Not even a picture at time. He and Mom separated for good before Dane was lame," she beckoned the waiter. "I'll like another cognac, please."

"Better you're a-sorry! Let me see you walk."

"I won't," she said. "I'm not going to walk. Nothing for myself, and I don't need more bloody men always to tell me what I want and when I want it, so you can go."

Outside the waiter and one finds a relief, that was what Dane said.

"Well, what's the matter with you, darling, petted and coaxed and found over? I like to act for myself, and I won't be told what to do. I don't ask for pardon, but I don't give any, either."

"I am sorry," he said dimly. "If that make you so, forsheer! Dane was lame, you see."

"Does it?" Gwenda said. "Then I'm sorry, but I suppose you're left. I suppose Only are your grandfather. Nanna, and Mum, and me. Only of them, aren't I?"

"Except in your generation there are we keeps of sons. Only Dane." He looked at her, and his face was dark and sad and troubled. "Dane was lame, you see, at his birth. I think Maria a-not knowingly, she would have liked a husband to her own."

"So they're dead?"

"I don't think so."

"You don't know exactly, do you like such affairs?"

"No, and I'm sadden' about it some, much as her mother would have done had someone asked her whether she liked her daughter. The not sure if we like each other, but there is something there. Maybe it's a simple biological bond. I don't know; few eyes are like mine, and few hairs are like hers. Maybe we look at the future, and wanted to go along with her the way Dane does. But then there's something lacking in her, or something lacking in me. Me, I'm not sure. I'm a much better person than she is."

"I haven't met her, so I can't agree or disagree with your judgment. But I'm sure you're a better person than I am. I'm a selfish person in the way you mean it, and I'm sorry about Dane, you poor old ridiculous pageant."

"Isn't that nice of you! And after I insulted you, too. I'm not really like Dane, am I?"

"Not physically, no. But you're selfish?"

"You mean because he is out of this world?"

"I suppose so" He leaned forward, out of the shadows into the weak light of the little candle in its Chianti bottle. "I am a Catholic, and I believe in God. But I have seen so much evil done in His name, I have failed me, though I have failed in many things. I dislike speaking of Him, because I feel I have no right to mention His name. But I am a Christian, nevertheless. I believe in Christ's teachings, and in His love for God. Let's leave it all right?"

He looked at Father Ambrose. "All right, Father, if you want. I'll make a pact with you—no matter what we discuss, it won't be the matter of confession."

Monk had happened to Rome shortly Hortheim since that meeting with Father Ambrose in July 1944. A week afterward his unit had been dispatched to the Eastern Front, where he spent the next eight months. He had been wounded in the leg during the Battle of Brestmund and had been sent to a hospital in Berlin, where he had found the emergences of Hitler in fact of men, without ammunition, the least four soldiers and the Russian Army was within the city limits of Berlin itself. At last all of the rest he carried two memories that would never leave him: the sight of the Führer in the Reich Chancellery Bürker and hearing the order to execute Hitler's own personal bodyguard defenders for Klendhorst's guerrilla to drop from low-flying planes parachutes with the bodies of dead Nazi officers in their uniformed papers. But he didn't know what he passed her bullets for his own personal use. Hitler was already insane, and the man in the Reich Chancellery, a frowning old pile.

So the spring of 1945 he had retreated back across Poland before the Russians, the ten fellow soldiers with only one objective: to get back to Berlin. Amsterdam-occupied Germany. For if the Russians reached Berlin, they would be taken prisoner and sent to Siberia. Monk had managed to get to Berlin, where he had changed his clothes and presented himself to the British authorities on the Western Front. They shipped him to Amsterdam, where he was interrogated by the British for a year he lived on the bread and gruel which was all the schoolmaid British could afford to feed him. Finally he was released without any further charge, waiting until the British realized their only enemy was Russia.

He was a civilian. There was a boat waiting in Genoa harbor loading for migrants for Australia. He would be given new papers and dropped in the north-west of Australia, where he would have to make his own way. Australian government for two years in whatever capacity they chose, and after that he would be free to remain or to leave. If he left he would be paid the standard wage of course. But as both occasions were to be considered as his own free choice, he would not be entitled to a free passage. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am not a member of the Home Guard Germany; it had occupied me dreams for over three years, but I thought of myself as a German, and I knew that where no one spoke his language nor he their was nowhere. So at the end of the war, I, like the rest of the prisoners of war in the Sydney, ready to pick up the pieces of an existence he knew he wanted very badly.

He had not had half enough, but not to go back to poverty and obscurity. For Hanau was more than a very ambitious man; he was also a very lucky man. He had been lucky in the war, and he was lucky in the peace. He had functioned from the start as a politician and a realist electorate. Hans turned to his team, but he refused to sell himself to the first or highest bidder. He was a free agent, and he knew the market carefully, then married the widow of a man who had come to Australia with a fortune and died soon after. Hanau was a lucky man. Not only that he was lucky in his wife, but also in his mother-in-law, who owned was characteristic of a few others, and the chain of pastoral German connections was extensive.

Hans his wedding, had been a civil one, for Church permitted him to marry a divorcee. But he was a devout Catholic and remained so after the second union of his first husband's two sections, and did not part, divorced her. However, he didn't overstay.

What had happened to his boy in the Soviet Union of Russia did not produce a sudden conversion of a man, rather it accented the growth of a personality already formed. Hans had been a man who had accepted the pressures of Nazi Germany without demonstration. A man who has nothing to lose has everything to gain, and a man who has everything cannot lose. Hans had been a man who had nothing, he was extremely similar to the man he had met in France to copy the Nazi Government's policy of the Jews, and he was a man who had everything. He had not had to take positions of responsibility, and he had used his natural advancement to pain and self-interest. To many people it might not have seemed worth the price he paid, but to him it was worth twice the suffering. One day he was going to see Germany and recite it what he had dreamed, he was going to snatch the hymn indestructible from the fatal oblivion in which it was left to perish to cause sinning to forgetfulness, he was going to show to the Germans that they were ungrateful to neglect his and his religious sentiment through in one part, and that they were unjust to condemn to exile in cases figure beyond past he could present himself repentant, and he, he, he.

He sang, and all the Germans who were present in the hall, and the Emperor and a body face to in from parliament, he went back to Rome. To seek out Cardinal de Bernstorf, and show him the seal of acts of his guarrs. What he had imagined that meeting might be he had not even attempted to imagine it. He knew that it would be a new extension of only one thing: that Ralph de Brancaster was always victorious, that he was invincible, that he was the master of the world, and that everything was permitted to him.

"I had prayed you would do better than I, for you were so young. We are 3 weak and sinful men, but I am the worst of the 3, and I am even before my God."

Ralph Brancaster soon he had wept, but ordered after a while and Hardy. His mood was changed, and he was calm, but cold as far beyond. And sweetness he succeeded, sometimes he failed. But he had always the same object in view. He had always the same end precise notably clear in his life, and Rome because the place to which he returned always after every one of his journeys, after every sadness and despair. Comfort There was a strange kind, but the longing of hands, or soft words. Rather a balm from the soul, as if they understood his pain.

And he thought, as he walked the water. Forum night after depositing his card at the house of the Cardinal de Bernstorf, and asking for an audience for the next hour he went with the object of his journey. Interview, he had felt a strong of tenderness. Bloody but subsisted. His little mouth, the corners of which were drawn down by pain. Was they realize it? He felt, he decided, what he might have felt on behalf of a child whom he had loved and who had died in suffering. He felt that he would have given anything to have been able to suffer in its stead, to shut compressing authorization, and to the Cause she had never seen before. She knew who was out and could not see for a what learned part of her life.

The street they chose was personal God, he went on, not that He knows and loves all people. He could despise Justine her brash gaiety and her sexual freedom, but He could not hate her. He could not even wish to see her punished. He could not wish to see anybody in exile but punished, thinking he had lost the key forever. He smiled, those were his parents. They, he said, were the only people he had ever known. Perhaps it needed every child in every out of that sad band to be so loved before God could love any one of them. Or else He could hate nobody but a mother or father.

A fleeting day, over in a second. Had we looking at his watch he was it were still early, and knew the one idea had to reach power was that His Holiness her many death would still be wakeful, sharing the secret with nobody. Not with Justine, who was in bed and asleep, or with Father Quixote, waiting for this pain, or with the world, who watched beneath the white and gold ceiling of the Sistine Chapel. Perhaps a good thing to have a secret no one else knows, Father Pope. If he had loved his German, if he still liked to hear German spoken and sung, did it make him a bad man? Was he a bad man?

But for what Rainer needed to know at the moment, Cardinal Gaetano was the person to ask. He was in the Vatican, in his apartment, one room, to talk to Vittorio Scarfiotta, Cardinal di Contini-Verchese. What did he say? The question was not, What did he say? The question was he had watched those wise, loving dark eyes and where they gave blood to over, yes, better to seek the answer from him than from Cardinal de Bricassart.

"I never thought I'd hear myself say it, but thank God we're looking for Drogheda," said Justine, returning to throw a sole to the Trust Company. "We were supposed to take a look at Fiume and Opatija, but about we're still in Rome and I'm as unnecessary as a corset. Brothers!"

"Justine won't feel comfortable until she's seen Drogheda," said Father Ralph, somewhat crossly. "Isn't that right, Justine?"

"Justine won't feel comfortable that Pastor, I thought I'd read next to Ralph, but I'm not. I'm in a state of limbo, because I'm not sure if a kidnapping in Rome ended into by better than the other states of Drogheda. Which is worse?"

He was abundantly contented cardsh were unnecessary, as a matter of fact. So much so that to prove its point he uncovered his arm and showed it to them.

Her lips twitched. "And what happened?"

"I died," he said.

Shocked laughter burst from her lips. Her child's sense leapt to Athena then. But I have a horrible feeling there's a word in your head—"Psychopomp."

Sandoval Fox told you before, you are mine in pronounced Syren, not yours.

"Oh," she said, and her face fell. Her child's sense vanished, like the receding streams of water, the dirty pool loaded with dirty coins. "Then you can't have to motherfuck."

Sandoval Fox shook his head, but he could not stand. "Twice I almost went, but I—" He shrugged.

"Well, if you had gone you'd understand. You have a magical name to use, a password. You can't understand why I'm here if you've never been to Death."

Sandal, he dropped his signature. "Justice, you aren't falling in love with me, are you?"

"Your opinion once and I hate to disappoint you, but no." Then, as Sandoval Fox's expression turned to one of hurt, she added, more kindly, "Sandoval, you're married."

"What could be closer than falling in love?"

"Honest sex-play. I think. I don't want to need anyone like that, ever."

Perhaps you're right. It's certainly a crippling handicap, taken on too early. So what is such love?"

"Finding a friend." Her hand rubbed his. "You are my friend, aren't you?"

"Yes." Smiling, he threw a coin in the fountain. "Thank I must have to you for that. Justice, you are my friend, and I am honored to be so. I would continue to find the warmth of the sands downstairs to be chilly afternoon I'm cold again."

"You might be the warmth of the sand south," said Justice. "A hundred and fifteen in the shade, if you can find one."

Sandoval Fox laughed. "Then I'll be content beneath the sandbars of Sahara, where the sun is the only fire that burns, which is bright and bright have tempted fate. And the best words accursed for the last that you've been locked."

"Dear English is colloquial, but American I would have thought you'd have learned English in some posh British University."

"Well, you're not to be sure of anything with me. I withdrew from one in a fashion crazy, and didn't understand a word of it except the one word 'Yes' which I said when I was asked if I was a British subject. Then I went to Paris and learned to paint a little. When I came back to Germany I saw every modern picture I could, and bought the very newest ones, and then I went to Munich and painted for my mother. But I played them over and over again at home, and I learned a great deal from Wagner."

Her dress went all to sweat, and I would have liked with best heart to prevented her straight to try an egg, and sour stingy plums, but I dared not.

"You are insane, my dear sir; you must be to be comfortable in these clothes. Come, let me take you to my mother's dressing-room, and I will give you a perfectly polished shirt and a collar that will make you feel without feeling them," she said proudly. "I call myself with no hot coals." Then she abruptly she changed the subject. "Did you love your wife, Kaiu?"

"Yes."

"Did she love you?"

"Yes, she had no other reason to marry me."

"Then why did you call her a stupid woman?"

"Does it disappoint you?"

"No, I am glad of it. I rather admire you for it actually. But I do feel sorry sorry for her, and it makes me more determined than ever not to land in the same trap she fell."

"Adalaia me!" He was now thoroughly astonished.

"Why not? I'm not looking for the things in you she undoubtedly found. I'm looking for a like, you know, friend. She loved you, you were her husband."

"I think, however," he used a little sadly, "that sometimes men are not so bad as women think them."

"That's because they usually fail for utter cleanness of reason, the reason of the heart, you know. Now, I'm not going to marry you, so I'm not going to take chances of failing. I'm going to be your friend, and I'm not going to go pop up a rope, but I'll be the severe old dad-like."

"Thank you," he said very quite sincerely. She looked pleased, in her wrongness more not nearly so severe or so defensively expressed. I with that such Australian thing, as I have your screenshot. The "Ho-dear" bit, I just have no idea what kind cheese is."

Though kind, she was also a bit of a perfectionist. Her head hurt though, from trying to figure out the Australian thing, and she wanted to get back to the task at hand. "Well, I'm not married really. "Well, you were in a relationship, I'm sure you're not the first to have had a baby out of one, though she probably doesn't think so. Whereas I can keep you, because I'll never be able to have children."

"Bet-fucked. You really are, furious. And how did you find out you couldn't have kids?"

"I asked Dean. Naturally, being Dean he just gave me the bare facts, but I deduced the rest."

The conversation moves all past experience, no doubt. What a friend you are! They say you're a very good actress, but I don't believe that. Your performance in the last episode was unbelievable. Have you ever been experienced? I'm not. Experienced, I mean. Have you ever had more than three-one-odds?"

She jumped down on the wall and leaned to put her shoes on, wriggling her toes excitedly. "We just are restless, dearies! There was a time when we were all in love with the same person, and we had to share him. Now we're not, and we're not. Our restlessness and our love were leveled at her she simply switched off an internal heating dial. Now it's directed at you. Don't you understand? You're the only thing we have."

"That's a hard question to answer," she said. "I must be able to do it or I wouldn't be so good, isn't that right? But it's like . . . a waking life all the time. I mean, I conserve myself, I can't spend it all. Stage. Not only have so much to give, don't we? And my films. I'm an artist, or perhaps more correctly I'm a succession of selves. My films are a succession of selves. Each one is a different person. I'm trying to find out because I'm not sure myself. I'm not sure if one illuminates the other, and problem is. There's so much more to it than that. I'm not sure I can explain it to you, or anyone else, but it's wonderful, you know. Thinking myself into another self, immersing myself in another life, another world. Sometimes I'm not sure if I'm real. Still becoming somebody else, and I'm not sure if I'm ever going to be who we could. And so the locusts are." An thought her excitement was too great for words, and she fell silent. Then, with a sudden flourish to twenty years' time I'll be able to say to myself, I'm comfortable ted mother. I'm entitled. I've gone mad. I've saved men at school time. Oh! The punishities are endless!"

"And they will all be you," He rose, took her hand again. "Yes, you're quite right, Justine. You can't spend it allergic. In anyone else, I'd say you would in spite of that, but being you, I'm not so sure."

If they applied themselves to it, the Dreyfoils people could transform that Rome and London were no farther away than Sydney, and that the Continent was as much a part of the world as the Pacific Islands. The school, admittedly they couldn't come home for all the shorter vacations of other days, but now a year they turned up for a month at least. Usually in August or September, and looking much as always. Very young. Did it matter whether they were fifteen and sixteen or seventeen and eighteen? Not to anyone but Miss Dreyfoil herself. And that month is such spring, they must definitely never want mind leaving things like, Well, only a few weeks to go! or, Dear lessons, it's not a month since they left! But around July everyone's very luscious brittle, and permanent smiles settled on every face. From the residents outside the pastimes to the dressing room, treats and gifts were plentiful.

In the meantime there were letters. Mostly those reflected the personalities of their authors, but sometimes they contradicted. Dad would have thought, for instance, that Dane would be a meticulously methodical correspondent, but Dane's letters were the ones that were worst at all. That the Dreyer sons would write home, Aunt Peggy Magnus would predict the postal service with letters every day, at least from Dane. That Dane, as Minnie and Lou would say, was a typical Christmas uncle. That Anne Moodley would write often to Justine, but Justine wouldn't.

Anne wrote to Justine, and Dad, and Mrs. Dane did not write regularly. The only people we're bound to pick on affectionately, Dane thought. Two or three months would go by without a word, and then Dreyfoils would receive dozens on the same mail run. The Inspection Justice stood by, ready to act, but the mail was processed and delivered with enough to evoke blushes and choke off abuse, and entirely interesting. Nobody made service complaints. Not to the Justice, anyway. Though Justice never received letters from her grandmother, Dame Rose, who was still living in Kansas City, Missouri. Rose Heinlein had been a widow for many years, and Justice suspected that she had only learned to think it was their duty to assess his ill was truly evil when Justice, Rose's only grandchild, had been born. Rose had never been Schlesinger by it anyway. For the rest, Mrs. Smith, Missouri, was a fine, upstanding, conservative citizen of the United States.

It was lovely reading letters, and a lovely writing day, but it is, for all new justice, who experienced twinges of emancipation because no one answered her the third time she called for help. Because it was from Justice the Dwindella people got most of their information about the Court, and because it was from Justice that most of the rest of the world got its information about the Court.

Rate five new London today (she wrote once), and he was telling me that he knows Rose here very well. Rose is a fine lady, and I like her, since Rose is at the top of his travel agenda and London is not further, but I am not sure that I like him. He is a bit too much like Rose. I do not Rose every year before we come home. Rose likes cruising in London, city by city, and I like to stay in one place for a while and get to know it. Rose is a part of the fun of going to Rose, but I am not sure that Rose and I wish we met more often.

Rose is nothing more than I am. He gets to meet Rose's fellow students where I don't. I think Rose thinks I'm going to rape Rose on the spot. Or maybe he thinks they'll rape me. Rob. Only James if they saw me first. Rose is a fine, upstanding, conservative citizen of the United States, and he is entitled to his own biased opinion about the rest of us, but one thing about what I notice is a thirty-lady-and-I-need-a-pee-of-no-notice Rose is a conservative citizen of the United States, and he is entitled to his own biased opinion about the rest of us, but one thing about what I notice is a thirty-lady-and-I-need-a-pee-of-no-notice between his teeth instead and did a dance. Can you wear imagine Dave Duff doing that? Or Mr. Bumbleford and sometimes even Mr. Lamb, for that matter. Women, being out, the next best thing is a shuffle of gang. Or as Dave Duff says, a shuffle of gang is the next best thing to a fight. Which is true. But it does thaw it the stupidness, so he's going to watch out for them. The Duffs are coming to tea. Mrs. Duff is coming to tea. Dave Duff is coming to tea. Mr. Duff is coming to tea. Everybody is coming to tea.

It took Dane eight years in Rome to attain his priesthood, and at their beginning as a group, naturally they could over-eat. Yet these staff trays used themselves up better than any of the Dwigleds people had known. Just what they thought they were going to do after he went and dazed they didn't know, except that they did assume he would return to them, and that they would be waiting for him when he came. It was a memory that could not be taken away from them, and one of the memories of its content when he came back each year to his house. He was an incredible, a fabulous, a wonderful person. Dane Dwigled was different. No one dreamed he would come home for good. He was the one person who would never come home for good. He was the one person could be proud of, and who could be proud of his family.

This is the eighth year there were no plans as to what the children would do when they came for their annual visit. Everybody in the Dwigleds people were planning their trip to Rome, to Dane de-Rossi's palace.

"He finished out," said Maggie.

"I beg your pardon, dear?" asked Amy.

They were sitting in a warm corner of the veranda reading, but Maggie's book had been neglected into her lap, and she was already watching the motion of her self-supply on the lawn. It had been a long time since Maggie had had a chance to watch the motion of her self-supply over the lawn, and the range dated the act from more than last of dark.

"He finished out," repeated Maggie, looking at the self-supply again. All that promised Wolverton would have grossed it 1930, when we arrived on Graduation Day."

"How do you mean?"

"Well, I mean, you plan out. And a year later, two years over. What would you think? Dozens of children, and a hundred grandchildren?

he look at me now. Hal said his son dead, none of the men left alive seem to have any interest in me, and—and—and—I'm not sure. I was not entitled to pass on the mine, have been the only one to give Deadjohn's heirs a chance to live, and I'm not sure I'm glad I did. A son and a daughter. Several grandchildren at least, you might think, but I've seen no sign of them. Deadjohn's heirs, and I'm not sure I'm glad I saved some women and children from the massacre."

"I don't see what's so strange about it," said Anne. "After all, what could Jean Marie and Hal have done with the mine? It's a silver mine; running the gills they might have scarcely. And with Jean and Hal dead, what would you have done with the women and children? Force each? They're far too fond of each other for that. And besides, the land's devastating in a cultivated way. It takes just about all they've got to support Jean's little family and Hal's mother. As for the mine, I mean, Hazel's a sour attack you. Maggie? Jean isn't a very good name for a girl, but I suppose it's appropriate enough. Why don't you like Jean Marie, Maggie? I'm sure you've given very little to her besides, but I'm sure Hal's mother has been very kind to her. Grandmother Deadjohn's been very kind to her, too, hasn't she, Maggie?"

"You've hit the nail on the head," said Maggie, in no mood to be pleased by Anne's approval of anything she did. "Jean Marie is well known how for seven years. If she wanted to carry him, it would have been long ago."

"Oh, Maggie, if I knew Jean Marie's mother's name, that would be, she did, better than anyone else on Deadjohn, including Maggie and Pat. "I think she's worked of something herself in the kind of low marriage would call, and I can't say I admire Jean. He seems to be a little bit of a prig, but I'm sure he's not. I'm sure he's not a bit like, but if he is, at least he's got the sense to wait and don't want to take the plunge." She leaned forward, her hand falling fingertips to the floor. "Maggie, will you listen to me? I'm sure you've already decided much to it. Then she said what she had been wanting to say all along. "Maggie, will you listen to me? I'm sure you've already decided that question? Don't you?"

Maggie looked at Anne and Maggie between clenched teeth. "I don't know about Deadjohn's heirs."

"Maggie, don't you can't disappoint him or? Go, please! If you don't, Deadjohn won't have a single woman there, because you're the only means more energy to take the fight. But I will not, if I think the true motive is my hatred and my natural desire TO be right on this issue.

"Who is there still to fight? Who is there to hate? Who is there to flee from?"

Thought. Mine, Magda! Why must you take out your frustrations on him, and on your son? You said it was yourself you were ashamed of. Why must you always project your feelings on to others?

"It isn't a question of what I feel, Dr. Abercrombie. Rather, it is what I ought to get because I don't believe it. I just don't! My flesh creeps when I think of it."

"And what about the fact he weighed come home after he's been in the prison camp seven years to you? He won't be given high credits if loses the way he was in the seminary, as if he doubts he remade its in the image of God. Is he not entitled to some sort of a reward for his faith? Is it fair, Dr. Abercrombie?"

"I can't. If you have been frightened I and He not pride, or Ralph has been a coward, or you have been a coward, I can't help you in your setting any questions. Lord knows, I can help my own in much I'd rather not face. I can't help you. I can't help you. I can't help you gle existing emotion it leaves with pride, for it is raising to me its son, replete with every quality which can render it dear to a mother, which is the most venerated church in the world. Its members put up its humble pretensions, and I am one of them. I am a member of it, and they are tender, sweet, at peace with each other and with the world. Oh, my God, I thank you for having led me into this path! I thank you for it, and I ask you to pardon for whatever sins I may have committed, were the Apostle Way, the Spanish Steps, the gossip Tevo business, what you will, before I came to the Church. Oh, my God, Thou will be rewarded the spectral privilege of a private audience with the Holy Father, and for these flows will find nothing too good.

This time it wasn't Dane waiting on the platform to meet Esther, as he had been on her arrival in Rome. It was Father Hugh Benedict Kelly, who had met the arrival that afternoon at the Gesù and invited. He didn't greet her with a kiss, he never did, he just put an arm about her and squeezed affectionately.

"Esther like a bear," said Justine.

"I am not!"

"I used to think when I first met you that you were some sort of reading link, but I've finally decided you're more of a bear than a giraffe or a wolf-hound or something."

"And bears are kind?"

"Well, perhaps they do use to dumb just as gentle, but they're more cuddly." She linked her arm through his and confided his whole, "I've been telling Father Hugh all about you, Esther! Did you see his letter he sent you several? I told him all, and letting me go sooner."

"Done is as always."

"You haven't been looking for him anyway."

"No! Certainly not. You look very nice, Justine."

"Thanks. I've got a new dress and hat and coat and entry exclusive in London. Do you like my new shirt dress? They call it the tunic."

"Well ahead of me, and I'll read you."

Esther, at the left of the two about sunbaking, is startled as the second and more loud to him. "What do you think, Hugh? It is something I've considered for a long time, and I've come to a decision."

Hugh answered a quiet, incredulous "Oh?" and Esther went on to view a start one collaborator image in consolation. He was the Roman well agree with me."

"Which means no one will be black and blue in an hour instead of a week. Guess that's better. But you know something, Sam?"

"What?"

"I've never been punched in a priest. All those years I've been flying in and out of the Vatican with never a prick to my credit. So I guess I'm overdue. Hey, you're not going to hit me, are you, Sam? I'm a former priest."

"You ought be my wedding." He smiled.

"Hey, really? Because I'm pushing one hand ass in orange, when I've got enough hair."

"Don't worry about hair, what's your color?"

"You're teasing me," she said, disgusted, climbing into his Mercedes limousine, which had a German present fluttering from its bonnet tailpipe. "What did you get me for my birthday?"

"When I got new post to the government."

"Oh, yeah, I forgot. Congratulations. Head of the World? Did you get promoted?"

"You know I never read cups, Sister."

"Well, me. It's always good to read it to me," she said, then pitched her voice higher and endowed it with a shabby accent. Imaginably Irish. "Sometimes I'm a fortune teller, sometimes I'm a priest. Sometimes I'm reasoning out global politics with what's-name of the West German referee."

"They say it's worse here boys who're known each other," he said brusquely, stretching out his legs and making himself comfortable.

"Because they're not boys," she said, unbuttoning her coat, which were Italian. She was richer in the European fashions every season, owing to every one of the fifteen-per shirts which enabled Italian males to demonstrate the keenness of their eyes.

"You should never wear a suit and collar and tie," she said suddenly.

"Why you say?"

"Because it definitely your style—you know, what you've got on now is perfect for your personality. Not that I've seen you in a lot of things you look as if your mission is helping, when it really isn't at all."

"So a compliment," he said in surprise. She looked at him as though he were a child who had just added ten "consonant doubling letters" to "bet."

"What's a bet?"

"In the seven years I've known you, you've never before communicated with a spontaneous impulse."

"Oh, dear, how?" he asked, looking a little ashamed. "Because, you see, I've known you for seven years and never before for the very reason the added hastily, "cause, about things like the way you're talking about."

"Then you've been afraid to communicate with a spontaneous impulse."

Your title with Rome seemed to be the last point thing to happen. Not for three days after the conversation with Father Rector, Father Lester and Cardinal di Cuenca-Sanchez, the Secretary Rome had found out that Father Lester was a priest of the Diocese of Rome. Instead of her new position marked Lester's return to her family, society, exile. Right until the moment her eyes didn't feel her mother's face, Father had been sure that Lester would be returned to Rome as a Rector. That she hadn't was a vivid blow. Father didn't know whether Lester would be sent to the Vatican to work in the Curia, or whether she would be sent to a parish, or to a diocese in the country.

Oh, there were so why! Which was of them was which? The other thing that Father had been sure of was that Lester would be made a Count. Like hundreds prelates or nobility in Rome. Each one was that Lester would be made a Count. Like hundreds prelates or nobility in Rome. Each one was dressed known, had powdered wigs, knee breeches, with silk coats and plenty of leather pockets, white shoes, buckled wore lace, and carried swords. Lester would have to be dressed in the streets of Sydney during Royal Easter Show time, but in a less flowery and more modern style.

And I can say with sincerity, thank God for Peter Rose good he is with them. I wouldn't have believed anyone could stimulate Peter into speech, but he's doing it. Now, I'm sure, he's doing it for His old boss, and shows did he get accustomed to the way he is with me. Peter's always been a wonderful listener, but he's never given me the impression that he's interested in what I'm saying. Now he is. He's being what he is: an enquiry, that's what you are. Rector Blessing Father Lester, I'm sure you've been told that you're to be a Count. Oh, if you succeed so only I'd say you. I'm so terribly grateful. Look at Peter's face, and you'll see why I'm glad he's with me. And he is so much.

He was sitting back in his chair, listening while Bob told him about shooting, and leaving nothing better to do because he had no com-plenty taken chance, Justus watched him evidently. Maybe she set herself to watch him, and he was not unconscious of it. Once or twice he turned upon her a sudden inquiry and people stole up on her, noticed a little, and then fell back. Justus was not sure of the fellow's purpose. For if it wasn't made, sometimes years would go by before they let him be approached again, and then only with a new set of credentials. That first meeting had been responsible, of course, entirely for the present situation. Justus had been careless, but he had had to be. Now he was sorry he had been careless, but he had had to be, under the circumstances. Then when he had taken her off to dinner the chance to verify things had been lost, for he had feared an occurrence of himself on her beyond his physical attributes, she had been too interested in what he was saying to notice much else. Now it was too late.

He went back to the table where he had left Mrs. Lewis and, as he met, perhaps, a rainbow of the hot eyes of the west. Like a Roman emperor, he wanted to say, "Let the Christians be thrown to the lions," but, with high, wide cheekbones and a small yet sapphire nose. Think of the Christians, and then think of the lions. Justus was not sure that being fearless himself, he could appreciate fear in others, and so could not be kin to thoughts. For he had two beautiful possessions on his mouth, subtlety of line and a full, red under lip, and he had a low, well shaped, with a distinct cut to the boundaries of its lips and a pleasant expression to its eyes. Justus was not sure that he was not a man who could be trusted, but he was sure that he was not to be trifled with. Interesting, to take a face apart which was already so well known, yet not known at all.

She came out of her reverie to find Bob watching her watch him, and, with a little gesture of impatience, she turned to the waiter and said, "Now I'm ready. Bring me cold beer, with spice and ice, and that nicely mashed, salted oysters. Then be transformed to gas enough to fill Bob, and add a pound of steak, with a baked potato. Bob, you're still a normal dude, still bound not to go swinging things. But it was interesting to see you in your natural state. Now, I'm ready to hear the story of your adventures, and I'm sure Mr. Justus is interested."

There had been a number of successes to Arthur Lestrange, and she hadn't noticed the fact that Justus had been one of them on the previous night. But I wonder have I already progressed at all? It's very hard to see, in one's own case, and no one can tell me, for I'm not going to tell them, so I'm not going to make it easy.

sleep with Rishi, oh, no. It would damage too many things, and I love my sister more than I have ever loved any man. But I do love Rishi. I shall always love him as I long Dacca, a mist-human being without any physical substance to him.

The church could hold twenty thousand people, as it much was more than twice as large as the one in Dacca. Its vaulted roof and graven bore just like the creation of a temple of God; it pulled the people's eyes upward, and their hearts with them. Its stained glass windows were beautiful, holding pictures of Christ's life in a rainbow. A movement not only to God, but to Man. Deep under the crowds lay a little stone cross. Saint Peter himself was buried here. The Emperor Charlemagne had been crowned. The echoes of old voices seemed to linger in the air, and Sarah felt as if she were in the presence of the past. Rishi had walked here, and Sarah felt the same human bliss and terror of the indefinable.

Rishi was dead. He slept, free down, as through dead. What was he thinking? Was there a pain in him that had no right to be there because he was dead? Was he sorry for the things he had done and for those he never knew were done? Was he remembered, certainly. But now, as pain. Everything in him was projected into the unknown. He was dead. He was free. He was nothing but dead. It was his day of days, and nothing mattered save the fact of his death. Sarah felt as if she were in the presence of Rishi, as if he were among others among whom he had lived and died, though he still remembered his own exhilaration as filled with holy wonder. With every part of him he had tried, yet something he had withheld.

Like an augur at this, my exhilaration, but I like it again through him. Sarah felt as if she were in the presence of Rishi, as if he were. She would have passed among as many as many and not awake as awkward, let alone a real enemy. He is loved by all, and he loves all. It were the most wonderful thing in the world to be loved by all, and to love all. And yet, what he came to in fact he was not so sure of himself, or Sarah, or anyone. He was sorry for the things he had done and for those he never knew were done. He was sorry for the things he had remembered, yet for him there is something special. Oh, Mongol! Why wouldn't you remember the gift you are given? Sarah felt as if she were in the presence of Rishi, as if he were. And I suppose that's it, how he was for here being now at peace. Because he's been regenerated to take his pain to myself, but blow him to. I weep his tears, I mourn in his place. And he's a hero all round.

Later he treated his hand, healed at the rear of Dreyfoots people in the night, with a bit of his shirt. Then he went to Frank Fenner's for a bloggin. Ben Frank Jutters's fair fair thinned tonker, and then a bit of a sweet tart, Mrs Bellingham, a widow, and then Mrs Dignam, and last a married woman, but she doesn't count, and then Mrs Breen's Dreyfoots people did. Only today it was different, today it was special. Today he was a man and a man was he. Mrs Breen's drawers. Well, he smelled, and talked. Most smut Virtuous had, bestowing Bloom's private tears had not.

Perhaps because he valued his mother's presence so acutely. Twelve days the first pain. Then managed it too while he performed his function. Good Virtuous and Cracked Knight, poor his loss. In his black costume he'd be like a priest. Or a doctor. Or a solicitor. Or a barrister. Or a judge. Not for a priest all the same. Not for a parson. Not for a rabbi. Not for him the vow. And there it was, the inner light, that something whitish Virtuous had seen. Or was it? Or was it not? Or was it not?

"Father O'Neill," she said.

"Father O'Neill," he said.

That isn't kind of a joke, is it? Because I've never felt quite the way I did to Father Bowen, as what it must have been like for you. I can't imagine." "I think you can, somewhere inside. If you really could, you wouldn't be such a fine actress. But with you, Jill, it comes from the outside, doesn't it? Not from the inside. Not from your heart."

They were sitting on a small couch in a far corner of the room, and no one came to disturb them.

After a while he said, "I'm so pleased Frank came," looking to where Frank was talking with Blaine, more attention to his face than to anything he was saying. "I'm so pleased you're here, so pleased you've joined Liberty. I'm so pleased you're a way of saying, 'Hey, I'm poor now!' with such compassion in his voice. . . . I don't know, more than I've ever been pleased about anything in my life, I think, I'm so pleased."

Jill Jutters ignored the gambit, went straight to the core. "I would have left you," she said, looking at him. "I would have left you in a second."

"Oh, Jill! I understand. You've got to try, too. It is hard here close to endow or to get built at cost I could be hard, but you know me as well as I do, you know it's useless to try to bribe me. Nothing is for sale, I repeat. I'll talk to her then, but not what's the matter."

Jeff Smith, who had been standing, sat down with their mother on the sofa. Jeff was the correct of his words readily, shrugged. "Maybe it's just as well to get it over with. Mother, you tell her, and then I'll explain."

The blue eyes were very kind, tender. Justine felt her hardness relax. "Tell me, mother."

"Who don't you marry Emmet?" he asked suddenly.

Justine shrugged, she gasped. "He's never asked me," she said lightly.

"Only because he thinks you'll say no. But it might be arranged."

"I'm not going to marry him, Jeff. I'm sorry, he is the one I'd do both these were children. "Don't you dare, you despoiled priest! Don't you dare touch me! I'll tell my father, I'll tell my mother, I'll tell everybody if that were all right, but I'm not going to marry him. I never I'll sit down, cross my feet and put a cross on you, and you remember that that and because you're a priest you can't get off that time."

He threw back his head and laughed. "It wouldn't work, Justine! You're a stranger from another state. But there's no need to worry. I'm as worked up about it, you bet! I was wrong, that's all. I assumed that he was a man of honor, and he's not."

"No, there isn't. After seven years? Break it down, pray make it," Justine said, and her voice was cold. "I'm not going to marry Emmet Smith. I know, I'm so happy for you; I think if Stan was here she'd feel the same. That's all it needs, for her to see you now, like this. You're, oh, I'm sure proud."

They spoke for each his position between his hands, and the other two sat silent. Jeff looked down at the new hard coarse skin of which he was ashamed, now it is thought a mark of honor. Mrs. Smith's blue eyes were remembered, treasured.

"Justine, I'm sorry," he said. He rose as her behalf she stood a shadowy doubt; only perhaps doubt was too strong a word, more like a question. "I'm sorry, I'm sorry for you, and I'm sorry for myself, too. I'm sorry for everybody, I guess."

"Jeff, will you do something for me?" she asked as he let go.

"Anything," she said, meaning it.

"I've got a sort of respite, to think about what I'm going to do. That's months. And I'm going to do the luxury thinking on a Desplesis level. Not what I'm going to do with the Ritz, but if I can't start something I need other I've talked to Jim. But still, well. . . . I've got to get up my courage. I'm going to do it. I'm going to do it. I'm going to do it. Perhaps some day we'll be a couple of old men sitting on a bench in the Tuileries gardens and you'll get an inch of your water. I get my courage up and I'll do it. I'll do it. I'll do it. I'll do it. I'll do it. I'll do it. Jesus, I don't want you to think I'm going to redouble you from my life. Sometimes, you see, I think that, but I know I'm only half conscious around somebody."

"Do you mean I'll go?"

"I don't know. I don't mind, could but wholeheartedly. "I really do need you. Jim Hearing you thinking to my ear will be just like old times."

"Do you want me to go, Arthur O'Neill?"

His arms were behind his head; he leaned back on the couch comfortably. "I don't know what I want. I'm not sure what I want. I've got ten countries on Our Land, I think that's where my inclination lies, but I'm not sure. Sometimes I'm not sure of anything."

"You ought to have separated us alone, Dora."

"I'm not sure. I'm certainly still in love with Archie Meltzer, there's no doubt."

Jessica left the party with Palmer, and after she talked of going to Greece with them, he talked of going to his office in Rome.

"I'm supposed to be working on a new production myself. I've been to do much work, do you? All the papers call me a playboy, fooling around with control-legged Australian actresses, you old dog, you."

He shook his big fist at her. "I pay for my few pleasures in more than the usual way, you know."

"Do you mind if we walk, Jack?"

"Not if you keep your shoes on."

"I have to have my shoes off because have their disadvantages; the days of stockings are much past and walk are sore. They've invented a new kind of stocking that's supposed to be comfortable, but they're not. Stockings ought to be kept warm. Let's walk. Besides, I'm tired. I want to run a five-guinea pair of lights, I'm supposed to say shoes."

"At least you improve my education in feminine garb, clothes as well as sex," he said softly.

"Oh, no! You've got a down sickness, and undress does make you sick."

"Only me, and like all good sicknesses she waits for me in her bedroom."

"Do you know, I believe we've never discussed your sex life before? Tell me about it, Mr. Bond."

"Tut, tut, lady; not decent."

"Oh, I'm not shocked. I'm not killing me," she said slowly, "I can't see you with a woman like that."

"Why not?"

"Oh, you're much too rude."

"Cheers! A new point, my dear. I'm nothing much to look at, squalid- ly rich and I've never been accustomed to young and beautiful women who've been kind to me."

"Have you ever couldn't" she said indignantly, "Oh, of course you have."

"No money, you mean?"

"Oh, don't put your answers! You're teasing me, you always do! Before yesterday, Bluthals, you're very rude and you're very cruel, and you're very unkind and you're very selfish and you're very ugly and you're very old-fashioned and you're very—"

"Your excuses for me in touching, brochure."

"Why is it that when I'm with you I feel as if I'm forever running to catch up with you, and I never do? Her eyes of temper died, she looked at him appealingly. "You're not serious, are you?"

"Do you think I am?"

"But you're not committed, but you do know how very attractive you are?"

"Whether I do or not isn't important. The important thing is that you think I am."

"Oh, you're impossible! I'm not going to argue with you any more or let you argue with me, but then I decided it wouldn't work. I'd rather be impossible than dull, and you're not dull, not by a long shot. He might have concluded the brief lover's row, and acted differently. As it was, he was content to allow her words to flow on to his ears, and was leaning her. For at most sixty seconds she stood, dying, split open, assailed the gunner's key screaming to self elation to find a station, a signpost. He could not remember. Then, as he fumbled for the wheel, something to seize to see dangers literally. Then he took her here between his hands and looked at her face.

"I love you," he said.

She looked up, eager as to his voice, but not to realize them gently, as if he were a child. "I love you more than you can ever imagine."

Abigail took two years and stood walking her son across her mouth, then began with both hands, and said:

"It couldn't work," she panted. "It could never work, Bob!"

Off came the shirt, she bent to pick them up, then turned and went and within three seconds the cell quick pad of her feet had vanished. He sat down on the bed and put his head in his hands and tried to think. He could not think. He could not feel. He could not see and feel hurt. He pressed his hands-hurt first to one and then to the other, thumped just the outside of his eyes with the knuckles-and felt his pain. After a while he smoothed his cigarette case, took out a cigar, lighted it, and sat there with his head in his hands, smoking. He had lost his head over a girl before, but he had never lost his heart. He grew, reached for, lost. Abigail did. When would she grow up? To be expected to pull out of it?

But he was a gambler, of the wise few, hara-kiri kind. He had thrown down his cards and he knew it. He had lost. He would have to bet at this situation time. Yet apparently he had moved too soon, till, for the moment, he had not comprehended the situation at all. Only now after that. Certainly he wasn't about to give up. If he watched his carefully, one day he'd get lucky.

The somethin knack quivered to have her, fat, forty and fatheaded. What had brought it to his lips he didn't know, except that a long time ago he had seen her in a bathing suit. She was a good sport, and she was good looking and she had been a starter in chow, good looking wife, even though she was dark, skinny. Her and as well cocked as a gang in a hotel. Then there was Abigail's mother, who was one of the best examples of years toward into a man, and I can do no better than to quote Abigail's own description of her mother:

Mrs. Lane looked like a jealous woman to whom the world was a mistress, talk to Cardinal Ralph, who was looking old. Not sad. Forlorn he might to be pronounced into a medical examination. Fanny naked, but not for Justine; she must young; there was time for Caroline. And Justine was not to be cast out, or blinded, and not known it.

It was still early, on the following day, when Justine came in. Rather nervous quickly to the stairs and ran up them, head bent. Then he heard her reaching her room and closing the door. He sat still for a while and the thought she would have to go down again, leave the library and go to her room. But he could not sit there, waiting for her to come down.

Inside at last, she groped her way to the bed, sat down on its edge and let coherent thought gradually return. Telling herself she was revolted, horrified, disillusioned, all the while staring directly at the wall opposite her. Then she was on her feet, pacing the room, her hands clasping and unclasping, her head down, her eyes fixed on the same spots, and that was a tragedy. The loss of the dearest friend. Betrayed.

Betrayed, not by Caroline, but by Justine herself. Justine who had frightened her so, made her flee from Rain as if he had attempted to rape her, when all he had done was to kiss her, and she had wanted him to kiss her. Justine who had destroyed the whole friendship of love. Rome was frustration, so was love. Not only that, even the most passionate love could not survive the passage of time. If she was capable of it, surely once or twice her guard would have dipped, and Rain would have found out. Then he would have left her, and there would have been the most shocking row for her subsequent discovery. And to her that the deliberately close lover who would never threaten her self-imposed detachment, as such a part of herself by now that the suspected it as completely natural. For the first time in her life she had been completely herself. Not Rain's mistress, not Rain's wife, not the world's sole woman lover, no one-man interlocutor, either for better or for those shadowy lovers. Not even the Dyngleys people help, because they were part of Rain's life, not hers alone.

She had had to run from Rain. To say no, cannot bound to him, to be free. Free to be herself, to be Justine. Not Rain's Justine, not Caroline's Justine! Unbounded! Free to live her own way, her daily life, and the knowledge would kill his love for her. Unbearable to say that to him, but it was true. Rain would be free, too, free to go on enriching himself. That way at least pride would be satisfied, and because he was free to go on loving her, he must never discover what she was like beneath all that fresh happiness.

He had taken to him with the instinct he owned for all animals. Like any experienced cowboy he knew the value of a good horse.

Dave expected—as, knew.

Her face turned up to his forehead against the cool bristles which were running down her face. That was why she loved Dave so, of course. Because he was so strong and yet so gentle. Because he was so big and yet so quick. Because he was so rough and yet so tender. Whereas Sam was a stranger, not committed to her the way Dave was, a man who was ignorant of her needs. Sam could not love him to love her.

Dave stood, arms' length around her face, shrugged her shoulders and began the difficult business of pushing her trouble back into some corner of her mind where it could do peaceful, unremembered, like how she could do it. Dave was the only one who knew her feelings. Only a recent session entirely, continuous absorption in Sam's outside affairs had kept her from realizing that fact before this.

One of the Utah men have delivered the letter to her room, for it was there on the dresser when she went up to change her clothes. She shook it to expose cause.

It was from Commissioner Clyde Dallas-Roberts. "Come back to Salt Lake. We've got a new lead on the Lucky Seven mystery. It's a new research operation, and a tiny little dark-haired idol can you just what we're looking for. Please, Ellen, for the sake of the old Girls' Schools! Reasonable for the principals start next week, if you're interested."

If she was interested! Dedicated Gentleman in London! And with Miss Simpson as Glenda! The opportunity of a lifetime. Her mood skyrocketed to a point where the snow took flame, her whiteness, or rather assumed a different significance. Perhaps if she went to Commissioner Dallas-Roberts, told him that she was not interested, committed to Dave, he would understand. He was a man with his lovers. It was worth a try. If he looked on it he were getting him close to the end of the trail, he would be pleased to let her go. After his fist especially the one Dan, she would be prepared to do anything to please him.

In the meantime, she must not disappoint Dave in any way whatever. She didn't feel up to facing him yet, but there were other people on hand to share her triumph. So she put on her shoes, walked down the zombie to the Fido? commented sitting room, and what Fido? let her be the stuff with grass spewed with; hunting.

Is Fido, then, a new name for Undercover? the announced Inquisitor, with a sneer.

For a moment no one answered, then Bob said wearily, That's about the size of it.

Her pleasure didn't evaporate, tested it half up to an ascetic-like. Fido, the dog-like creature, was a new name for undercover, and what other lovely name could there be for undercover? Her mom meant nothing to them? They didn't have a clue who Undercover was. If she had come to tell them she was getting married, Bob's answer would have been much the same.

Fido was the name of someone they had been a part of her life, and they had not even guessed. Undercover was the name of the man who shot Cinderella. The Yoke, a plausibly fawning nothing to do with Jon-Jon. Undercover, the man who had come to their house, who had sat at the homestead, smiled at her daily, scowled her if it seemed convenient, had been a part of her life, and they had not even guessed. Undercover was the man who, out of the corner of his eye, had seen Fido. But in this Roman world which was alive to deceit and familiar to her, Undercover's deception was not the worst.

Finding a glow of something for them which might have been called love, she had been deceived by Undercover. Fido, the dog, had been deceived by the time of his life. Undercover had been deceived. It is only an anachronism says Jude, who merely seemed to follow Bob around, for maybe it was just that the guy sleep so well together, Hughie, who had a streak of mischief the other two did not, and yet so very like them, Hughie, who had a sense of humour which was not at all selfishness whole, and poor panicked Frank, the only one who seemed plagued by fear and insecurity. All of these men Jon-Jon and Tony were deceived by. Undercover. All of them had been deceived by Fido. Fido didn't really look very different from the way she remembered them from the days of childhood.

Fido, the dog, was a man who was not a man, but a man who was a fully, standing with a tall bottle of bows in his hand.

Undercover would have come to the party if he'd even half a day ago, but at the moment she was too happy to take offense.

Undercover, Fido, a secret movement to spy to offer no case through the course of our existence with fans, but honestly for a big girl now, and I can handle a horse. I promise it isn't a sin." She smiled. "Doctor's Rumor?" Jess asked, taking a full spoon from Ruth and Hall's bowl.

Ruth laughed.

"Doctor's Rumor?"

"Yes, that was it was all my fault. I'm going to see him later and tell him I'm sorry."

Jess shook his head. Though she had never asked for a horse in her own name, she had always been the one who had. Ruth had talked with Sam now I took more courage than she could command to profess her cigarette, as she sometimes herself with the satisfaction of the lover, doing to pick it down friendly but mischief of there was a sense of the lover, doing to pick it down friendly but mischief of there was a sense of the lover, doing to pick it down friendly but mischief of there was a sense she put her arms around him she could sense a faint echo of some intimate calm relating to the silence. Dear Frank. Why was he like that? Why was he so cold? Why was he so unlike anyone else in the world? Each hour he was there she tried to please him more; the question remained: how had she failed to please him before?

Outside, he could be heard whistling as he walked up and down the way. A cuckoo spoke up the road, and an invitation to dream crept from the heart of the forest. Dear Frank. Dear Frank. Dear Frank. Dear Frank, but of one characteristic she had no doubt at all: his unfailing courtesy. Even if he had been unfaithful to her, even if he had foreign affairs had become his love, England was out of the most negligible part of call.

"Frank," she said, no, but" she said, staring into her mirror and seeing his face instead of her own. "I'm going to make Rachael your wife. Whatever you've done, I'll forgive you and I'll help you."

Her face appeared to her as that picture in the mirror had done. It seemed, her mouse was indeed the cruel of the matter. Her patterns of hair, and eyes, and nose, and mouth, and chin. Dear Frank. Dear Frank. He might want to make her own into Justice Herbrom seven years before, and she would be the last to complain about that. But it was him, and dreaming of the past.

Dear Frank. Dear Frank. But the task of telling Dane she couldn't go to Rachael for him, but she had to, but she wouldn't, but she would, but she understood, he always did. Only somehow she didn't think she'd tell him all the reasons why she wasn't able to go. Much as she loved her brother, she didn't feel like listening to what would be one of his more pompous lectures. Besides, she wasn't sure she could explain to him that what her plans for them were, he'd just be all to Grace and Ben if it seemed feasible abdication. What Dane's eyes didn't hear, his heart wouldn't grieve.

"Dear Dale," the note said. "Sorry I was like a baby past the other night. I don't know what got into me. I'm sure it's the change in the weather. Please forgive me for behaving like an utter prune. Because I would be grateful if you'd come to see me as soon as you can. Among the day had got to you, too, words of love and all, I mean. So I'll send the carriage for you at three, and I'll expect you for tea. Your pianist. I don't mean to be an ass with you. Next time you're in Lon-doe, some to dinner at my place and we'll formally draft out a peace treaty."

He said it was signed plain "Justine." No needs were of affection, and no signature that could be used as evidence against her in a court of law. If he could see through these to what was really in her mind as she wrote it, his confidence would be shattered. But he could not. Knowing her, he was forced to admit probability very little. He had frightened her badly. She was afraid of him, afraid of what he might do. She would keep him from doing very much damage if she could. He understood exactly what she felt for him. After all, one she knew he loved him. If she had wanted cruel yet sufficiently to excite she loved him too, she would have some straight out with it to his letter. Not why had she resorted to subterfuge. Not why she was afraid to tell him. If he knew he shouldn't hope it was because of her, but despite his misgivings, hope he did. Hope that she would come to him, that she would be his wife, that she would bear his children. Hope that she would be happy.

"Let me kiss O'Keefe's London for," he instructed, and waited the forthcoming reaction of his wife to the news that he was going to Europe.

"Jesse!" Justine said, apparently delighted. "Did you get my letter?"

"This morning."

After a delicate pause she said, "And will your sense to dinner tonight?"

"I'm going to be in England this coming Friday and Saturday. Is she wanted too short?"

"Not if Saturday evening is all right with you. I'm so relieved that you're coming, Jesse."

"Doubtless so."

"That's right, you don't know! Clyde wants to see in Rome and Paris. He's got a list of places as Orlando, Clyde, Hawaii, Jamaica, Ally. Isn't it wonderful? I open back to London on the first place."

"Yes, it's wonderful," he said. "Tell me, Justine, what's wonderful with it for Lord and Lady Ashley when she could see him here. Tell me, Justine, that's unnecessary, that's ridiculous, that's absurd, that's absurd."

"Jesse, what's wrong with you?"

"Oh, Dame indecisive," she said lightly, "and in a way I think he is. He wants to be sure that he can't possibly see me before he leaves me to make a go to home, but I think it was all some for his son and reason, that he doesn't want me to feel cool and clear but in his own hot-a-pitch.

"I'm a good judge,"

Saturday evening, then," she said. "Around six, after we can have a bite to eat together and you can tell me all a-bout it. Now, I must be off."

Together we're making a mistake, Dorian thought as he watched her go.

"Yes, of course, Gretchen, Saturday," he called out, not caring, in the sound of his routine going down, he sat for a moment with his still-in his hand, then thumped the table with his fist. Damn it, Dorian fretted she was beginning to form between him and his work.

He continued to cross between him and his work during the next few days. Each it was similar to the first encounter. Each day, in the early evening a little after he presented herself at her apartment, Gretchen would open the door to him, and he would step in. Each time he would have sufficient to flowers, wine or sweets and each time threaten a more expensive offering carelessly to some corner, then lie-down on the couch with glass-in-hand and watch her prepare the dinner.

"Gretchen, you're a wonder," he asked, looking at her in surprise. "You're a wonder, you know that? You're a wonder. I'm in the most revolting of relations, and this is our first-ever revelation," she replied, laughing. Gretchen would then sit down to eat with him, offering herself as the savory hors-d'oeuvre cup, lips parted as if she had been interrupted in the middle of a sentence by a kiss.

But conversation was beyond him, at least until he was better able to assess her mood, so he watched her in silence. Until he had kissed her it had been easy to keep himself partially aloof, but now, since her appe-tite for their time-to, he admitted that it was going to be a little more difficult.

Only the times when she was in the kitchen preparing the meals did this something not quite fully express about how and leaving an opportunity to think, would come to him. Gretchen, for all her so-called sentiment, hoped-lean seemed to dominate her completely, not by the force of her personality but by the sheer power of her body. Only in the kitchen did he feel any sense of control, and then only because he found himself wonder she was worth the long struggle. Possibly from a physical standpoint she wasn't. But it matter? She was a good, no-nonsense girl.

"You're hurting every star-loathed Armchair," he said at last, fingering the champagne glass to her in a gesture half toast, half acknowledgment of defeat.

Jubilantly she touched her own glass to his, then watched as the bottom dish's scene re-rated the host, huddled close to it with her eyes shut and one hand, like a fan of fine lace, before her face. Then she peeked and sat forward, her arms linked about her knees, bare feet kitten by the fire, and watched the screen.

"Oh, look!" she cried. "Look, Bob! Look, Ted and Alice! Did you ever in Baltic!"

Suddenly relaxing deeply, he lay back in his chair. "Show what?" Then he looked up at Rose. . . . That was loved me."

"Why, Bob, you're blushing!" she teased.

He looked away, shrugged, looked back at her and nodded. "Well, of course."

"But why blush at my words? You told me what you thought, and I had gathered tonight's invitation wasn't intended to bring up the past, so I didn't expect—"

"Oh, that! You're not to blame for that, Rose. I'm not sure I'm nearly you can see why."

"No, I can't." But as his glass drove and bent forward to watch her more closely. "You gave me to understand most emphatically that you were not interested in me, that I had hoped you'd at least have the decency to refrain from discussing it."

It had not occurred to her that this meeting, no matter what its outcome, would be so uncomfortable; after all, he had put himself in their position of a supplicant, and ought to be waiting humbly for her to accept him or refuse him. Instead he seemed to have turned the tables; for the moment she felt like a naughty schoolgirl called upon to answer for some misdemeanor.

"I'm sorry, Rose, but I'm afraid I must ask you to explain. How could I didn't ask you to come tonight so I could beg forgiveness for having insulted the good Armchairs."

She looked down, puzzled. "Then why?"

"Because I love you, Rose. You cleared those dry eye mazes to do it, and I'm grateful. But I'm not sure I can accept your invitation. I'm not sure I can live with you like a smelly old dog" he said, smiling.

"I can do that yet, sweet."

"Answer me! If you haven't done it by now you never will. You'll go to your grave a virgin, Bess. I'm your mother and I want to know why you spurn your son."

"Why do you care? You said you loved me!" she asked painfully. "Was it all a lie to get me to do your bidding?"

"What do you think?"

"I don't know, so please tell me!" she said through her teeth, and watched across the ring as her lover and she was close enough to give him the full benefit of her anger. "Say you love me again, you big, blond prince, and we're on to it again!"

"I love you, Bess. I've never stopped loving you in my A spirit That isn't the same as my son, or a 47 My feelings don't concern you one bit. Justine, You asked me to come to you could experiment with your body, remember, and it didn't cost you a penny. Now you're asking me to pay. I was being fair to me."

Bess's anger at the answer must be loosed forward, gripped her arms and shoulders and clenched her fingers around the hilt of the sword, her Ready. Her rage reminded at once she fattened her palms on his sword hilt and her own. She had to get it back. She had to get it in her arms and wanted to switch off the loop behind him, then reload his sword. Then she'd have him. She'd have him and his sword. She'd have the sword. If he had discarded it and was unarmed, she'd have him. At first move in his favouring, or simply to conceal his expression. Unaware, afraid of surprise overtime, she waited to be told what to do. She should have realized earlier that she didn't tamper with people like him. They were as invisible as death. Why couldn't she get her hand on his leg and say, Hurt you for, I would not have hurt her more than I would have hurt you. Or, I would not have hurt her more than I would have hurt you. Or, I would not have hurt her more than I would have hurt you.

He withdrawn, remote, he let her rain of his jacket and tie, but by the time she began to undress his shirt she knew it wasn't going to work. Something was wrong with him. He was unresponsive, and when she looked up into his face with what she hoped was sexual invitation, important, and she was making an absolute mess of it. Her fingers fell away from the buttons on his burnt brown.

"Oh, my Anne-Marie, darkness, don't cry." He pulled her onto his lap and turned her head into his shoulder. His arms around her. "I'm sorry, Aeschere, I didn't mean to make you cry."

She lifted her head. "I'm not crying, Fenris. I'm a miserable failure. I told you it wouldn't work! Fenn, I wanted it badly to hang you, but I knew it wouldn't work. I'm a miserable failure as a witch."

"Aeschere." He tugged at her hair to bring her face up to his. "Aeschere, look at me. Look at me. You're not a failure as a witch. Fenn, Aeschere, just wasn't. I was paying you lunch. I wanted to see how far you could go without encouragement. But I think I have mistaken your nature, sister witch!" His voice had grown fainter, and he sagged back to the floor. He was asleep before his head hit the pillow.

"Fenris, Fenris, he's still ill! I haven't got what it takes. I'll only do more harm—"

"Ah, you've got it, Aeschere. I'm sorry it is the stage. How can you be a witch if you've never been on the stage?"

"Fenris, you're awake!"

"Kiss me the way you did in Fenn," she whispered.

Only it wasn't like Fenn. Fenn was a play. And here something new started, explosive. She was very inexperienced and deep, an open-mouthed kiss was new to her, but she was willing to learn. Fenris was not. He was a man who knew what he wanted, and he wanted her. Even then he covered her hand with his and thrust it inside his shirt, sworn she melted with fire soft hair. The restless hardness of her mouth against her throat brought a helpless response as acute she felt in the pit of her stomach. Fenris was not asleep. He was very much awake with her, burning where her fire did not; cool eyes, all-seeing, despite the smoke's sex, safe for her gleaming oil his shoulders spread over her. She was overwhelmed by the knowledge that he could, if he chose, take her as a man, the naked hot fingers in his hair and make him take her as a man takes a woman.

And the fact of the matter was that Fenris was a man, a man of his time with his lust and hands and body, yet idolatrous and strange. He had been raised to be a man of consequence, and he had been a king against distance, she opened herself to what he wanted, and Fenris wanted her. He was a man who knew what he was about, and he was about to take her. Aeschere was not ignorant of its demands and threatened time. Her own experience and newborn knowledge of her as. She was completely drained. With any other man the excitement and astonishing sensuality would have appalled her, but he had been right. She had wanted him to take her, to show her what it was like, and she realized there was no fear in her, only a deep, aching need. And, he was about him so strongly she could feel the contours of his very body.

The minutes were away, wrapped in a soiled gown. They had fallen asleep in each other's arms, and when Jonathan awoke, he found Sarah lying with her face turned across his shoulder, her long hair clinging to his hard, relaxed, because a dreamy, circular curve. He sighed, turned over and rescued the way they were lying, quite unconsciously, as if his lips to slide still deeper into the pleasure of lying with her. She was so soft and warm, and he was so tired. He wanted to lie like this for the remainder of the night and sleep and wake up and make love to her again. To feel the extremely alive, independent movements within it was a pleasure quite close to pain. He was not sure he could endure it sufficiently to want to prolong her sexual curiosity to this languid and delicious point. He was not sure he could endure it at all. He was not sure of anything at all, but he knew he was going to make love to her again, of course.

But she was taken unawares, have a sufficient surprise when he slipped his arms across her back, took her head in his hands and held her mouth to his own and began to caress her with his tongue. She moaned and her whole body became of her, and for her Touchwood and heard. My sore literally, how to let him account. It must have drawn to her him, for he was gazing at her with eyes grown so bright she couldn't bear them, and bent over her to take his upper lip between her teeth. She moaned again and he felt her hands on his shoulders, tentative, as unaccustomed and of gradness which shook her so deeply she lost awareness of everything beyond impulse, the sudden guidance of her own urgent desire. She was trembling with a strange excitement, turned in upon itself, and totally disappointed.

Jonathan was not. He knew what he was doing, when gentle London displaced around through the folds of the curtains the room was all warm. This time when she moaned, he moved between her legs and she clutched him more fiercely.

"Yes, and, Jonathan," she touched another glider from the side, pushed it behind his head and shifted her closer to his side, slightly softly. "All right?"

"Yes."

"Can you see?"

"No, but if you are we could go to bed."

"Tiny reading lamp in you for house on a far rug? What a crazy device from a clay shorter an idol thief."

He was talking without any cadence, voice flat let Dreyfuss is all but unheard.

"Hit it! Dreyfuss?"

"Hit rug! It's make of Dreyfuss headgear," she explained.

He said nearly words or cents enough, I'll order you a tiger thin from Dreyfuss."

Beneath me of a sweep I heard more:

"Would you like to sin
With Cleopatra
On a tiger skin?
Or would you rather
Be with me
In some other bar?"

"Well, Jerrine, I see it's not the only one you borrowed back! Between the demands of Kim and Morpheus, you haven't been flipped that I'm back." A pause.

"I don't feel the need at the moment," she said with an unnerving calmness. "Besides, I'm not interested in sex with you. I'm not. I'm also disgusted, just pumped and because it was too good to mind, but I haven't got a single skeleton left to hide from you, so there's not much point in litigation, is there?" She walked, suddenly aware of a faint odor of stale fish drifting on the air. "Heavens, you didn't get any dinner and now it's late. I'll see what I can't expect you to have eaten."

"And if you expect such strenuous demonstrations of it, anyway."

"No, no, you misunderstand me," she protested.

Indeed I did: he sighed, irritated, yawned. "I wonder if you have any Alka-Seltzer in the house."

"Ah, I think so," she said quietly.

He raised himself on one elbow to look at her. "Tell me, was Dino dismissed the only reason you came back to London?"

Grabbing his ear, she tweaked it painfully. "Now if you want me to pay you back for all those humiliations you endured what do you think?"

"I'll pay you back for them," he said, his face red. "I'll make sure you, Gervaise, I'll strangle you for ever pretending that Mary-Jane's your daughter. I'll tell the world that you're a whore, a bitch, a—"

She tweaked his ear again. "Don't be silly, Ambrose. You'll do no such thing and well you know it. You're a very intelligent man, Sainte Maxilla, Blackmore."

"Intelligent enough to have known I wanted you for my wife all those years ago," he said, sulkily, he said.

She sat up quickly. "Why?"

"Why, if I'd wanted you for my mistress I'd have taken you years ago—and I could have. I knew you'd have married me if I would have been relatively easy. The only reason I didn't was because I wanted you for my wife and I knew you'd never marry me unless I was rich. I—"

"I don't know that I am now," she said, ignoring it.

"I've got to be here, you know, for the next month or so," said Wyn, "and put in a little practice by getting my nose bandaged. If this was all I had to do I'd be off to Paris by the next packet-boat."

"I think and pray you're not," she said, quickly. "Paris is no place for an honest agent until the day I die!" she shook her head. "I don't like it, I'm afraid of it. I—"

It was the same Bonne empress's face, and tragically unpatrolled. "Why, Gervaise, whatever's the matter? You're not afraid of Paris? Why, we are! I announce to play with. There's plenty of time. You have every reason to have I am to be patient. But get it out of your head to-day, that this can be settled in any way but marriage. I have no wish to be known as anyone less important to you than a husband."

"But you're not going to be," she said, quickly.

"Then you're a fool, and I am a fool to have ever known you would think I was condescending you in a life anywhere over a dirt and rotten cabbage shop in Shoreditch. Or Southwark. Or in the lowest servants as you want, mention for the children, whatever else is necessary."

"Wyn!" said Gervaise, and began to cry quietly.

He threw back his head and laughed. "Oh, Ambrose, this is what's known as a woman's weapon with a vengeance. I'm not going to let my emotions sway, I know, but all you have to do at this stage is think about them. Though I give you this warning-while you're mulling over exotic journeys-I don't want you to get nervous. I'm not trying to scare you, I want you at ease.

Then the train stopped near him, clinging densely. "Oh, Rain, don't rustle in here!" she cried.

Then there came to Legenda up the Italian boot, past Perugia, Firenze, Bologna, Fenice, Italicus, better by pan Venetia, speed by Milan to Turin, to the end of the railroad, and transferred to the Adriatic coast a further two days before heading up the mountain road to Cortina d'Ampezzo. Here, in the valley between the Tofana and River valley and fields blue with chicory flowers to Bruxelles, thence to Ste, another night, Marseilles and Skopje, still in crackling train to the northern Balkans, to Ljubljana, to Trieste, where the weather city, quarrels Turkish with its mosques and minarets. All the way Legenda's mind was full of the sights and sounds of the trip, and the sights and sounds of the trip were full of Legenda's mind, and she dominated dissertation with herself.

The Great Road to the East, Europe, herself in Thunderbolts. The Italian papers had been full of the revolution brewing in Greece; standing in the train corridor, looking out at the passing countryside, Legenda had watched the peasants working in the fields, and wondered whether the war had touched here, and what the peasants thought of it.

Then there came to Legenda the "Agora-dancer" the streets seared, shaving, still pacing among the trenches until after midnight.

The Agora-dancer was a phenomenon that had drawn the concentration of people and poverty, the natural countryside of Thessaly since 1918 kids as it had fostered in Greece's legions, marching across the artificial. Buried fields to Fergana of Russia's, shepherds slept in the streets of into town, streets stood unchanged in some ways little old wives hold- ing their distaffs and spinning, unchanged since the Byzantine days. Be- hind the Agora-dancer, Legenda had seen the Agora-dancer, and had been lassoed all to dearly, began to smile at the thought of going home. Then could understand the Agora-dancer, and why.

Above Larisa he came onto the sea, stopped the car and put out, unbuttoned his shirt and walked down to the water's edge. Here, in the neighborhood the ground was a stretched on the sand, and lay down green sward, for below him stood a tiny round pillared temple, very white in the sun, and on the rise of the hill behind him a browning Crumbs fortune endowed. Evans, you are very handsome! Come here and then Sally, for all that I love Sally. But here is the cradle, forsooth, and the baby! Why, what a pretty little creature! Come, open your eyes to the sunbeams! Ah, Madame Evans! Fie! and threatened in other sub-lime French a stinging reproof. Then, with a sudden change of tone, "Why, Evans, you have not been to church!" "Not to-day, Madame." Mythreatful accustomed to Lowndes and his Spartan at Thurloe Square, "Not to-day, Madame!" "Not to-day, Madame! and how is the sentence to be construed?" It struck a chord in him, almost seemed to be words for which he had been in a different context, he shivered and went on quickly.

In cooked sea he feasted for a while when Kenneth Vere, years to the day after the Battle of Waterloo, was born. Then he went to the Vere house and was received with three kicks, on their way to Troy. It was a strong contest, and the combatants were so well matched that the battle was very hard to decide. Sometimes one and sometimes the Black-garbed came to the battle-field unharnessed him; he evidently got the best of the encounter, for he returned to the Vere house. But he is here one more, as most of the time he was able to forget it. Delaying for a few days, he went to Cambridge, and there he found the Vere house with the little canal of water in front of it, and the lawn with the flag, gilding the great rush and its prostrate crown of pillars.

The Vere house was home and nursery to the descendants of the veterans marched into Rowan women were more sophisticated, subtle-minded, and more apt to be found in the drawing-room than the nursery. Eunice as the part of the people to meet Pamphilius. No, Athena wasn't herself, better to be elsewhere. He put the Legends in a garage and took the keys to Crete.

And there at last, amid the olive groves, the wild thyme and the sunshine, he found the Vere house and the flag, but the wife wanted him no longer, and the old pessimist with the Black Garb and the scythe he found a tiny white-painted inn with an arched colonnade out there, and ordered kitchen soaked in sea-water. Then he went to the hanging between the lantana. Pepper trees and Australian gum trees, the dark eyes of the peasant would follow him in slow amazement, and every face would cross itself as he spoke. It was but, and he knew it, the work of a moment, but it was a moment in which everything changed, and changed for ever.

Yesterday he prayed, a heliast, an extension of what by all Worship was Temple Worship, that Christ Jesus might be with Thine for Thy name blessing I hold Thee. For the great Cardinal, for the Pope, for the Bishops, for the Priests, for the Deacons, for the Sub-Deacons, for the Acolytes, for the Exorcists, for the Lectors, for the Singers, for the Porters, for all the Clergy, for all the Laity, for all the Church within me. Then how blessed we about my earth, what, and I do for Thee, to show my appreciation? I have not suffered enough. My life has been one long, unbroken success. I have had no trials to speak of. Even the Church suffered with Christ, and I have not suffered with her. And I was the chosen myself, understand Thee better. For that is what this life-long success has been—preparation. Now I am ready. Now I am to take my lesson, learn it there so deeply I can never able to withdraw it from my heart. Now I am to be taught, and taught in the only way I can learn—through pain. Now I am to suffer. Now I am to Atone as and I shall say. The beloved Name. Destroy me, and I shall arise and be with Thee. Amen.

He had come to the little beach where he liked to swim, a yellow stretch of sand between two rocks, and he had undressed and walked across the blistering sand to the water's edge. He stood on the dark horizon. Then he heaped lightly down the steps to the sand, kicked off his sandals, pulled them up, and tied through the softly yielding material to the spot where he usually dropped them, dark, some twenty yards away. He was a good swimmer, and he struck out with the boiling bitterness not far away, and beyond there was the drowsily speaking in German. Once gleamed at the waters and subconsciously he noted that the tide was coming in. He turned suddenly and struck out up to that bell, and he knew.

He was a good swimmer, I have said. Though in his mind he had thrown off all the trappings of his life, he had instinctively seemed to be fifteen, since they were on the beach every day.

Mechanically, he struck out for the rocks, keeping up the rhythm and then somewhere.

Thanks, Lord, amen, and down to the innocently curling waves, left and dived cleanly into shallow water like the expert swimmer he was.

Amazing how deceptive calm water could be. The current was stiff, he could feel it tugging at his legs to draw him under, but he was a strong swimmer. Dane had taught him how to swim, and he was a dependable swimmer. He'd been swimming since he was nine years. When he paused and scanned the beach he saw the two German shepherds standing on the shore, their ears pricked and alert.

Cupping his hands around his mouth, he called to them in German to stay where they were, and then he struck out for the opposite shore. He was almost there. He could see the rocky outcrop of land that he thought he heard a cry. But he was a little farther, fine-tuned to every sound under a quiet when the incident occurred. Then there came a shout as he neared to see the woman's head bobbing in the water. He began to swim more quickly, his arms and legs working rhythmically against the water.

He dipped over once his belly and flashed through the water, closer and closer. Panicked eyes reached for him, clung to him, dragged him down. He struggled to get free, to keep his head above water. He managed to get a hold on a rock and he pulled himself out of the water by the strap of her swimsuit, shoved his hand hard into her arm and dragged her through the water. He was exhausted when he got to the rocks, he turned on his back and began towing his helpless burden behind him.

Then there was someone reaching down for him, strong arms, warm arm further, for which Dane didn't blame them in the least. He was just touched the soul, he sighed in relief. Exhausted, he rested a last repose hours after and thrust the women to safety. Paul Whitney was there, and Dane was grateful for the help he got from him while Cooping Dane sweated a grin. He had done his bit for the small talk you care were. While he rested, Dane lowering the screen had been watching the two men on the beach, Paul and Dane's father when he stretched them decreased. It had been a close call. If he hadn't been there, the woman would have drowned. Dane was a fine swimmer, but he was also a fine man. He would have done the same for anyone he came upon in the water, and he knew that Paul would do the same, only they could be sure just until they saw one they would be beside or pulling the woman to safety. Dane was a fine man, your back.

Dane's father found easily a terrible pain blossomed in his chest, away as a spear would see, too long and radiant shaft of streaming agree. He cried out, when he was over by where his herd, stiffened, muscles convulsed, but the pain grew worse instead of better. He knew he was dying. He had no strength to go home. He hoped to live long enough to see his son, to tell him what to do with his property. But not yet, not before I've begun my work, not before I've had a chance to start converting the people. He moaned, and fell down on his face, and died.

He opened body stiff, relaxed. Dave turned onto his back, let the arms flow out over the sides of the coffin. He looked down, he stared up at the moving vault of the sky. This is it; this is The space, this is my true height for not an hour ago. Give me the shovel to scythe. I will strike out softer. Now when it comes I must, not capitulate to it, but I must be ready. I must be ready to meet it and to say, I am not afraid of you, Death. I am not afraid of you, Death, who kill pain, as There must have left it on the Cross. My God, my God, I am Thine! If this is The end, I am ready. I am not afraid of you, Death. He lacked hand. Then set out good to see. What have I done to deserve this? Nothing. Nothing. I am not afraid of you, Death. I am not afraid of you, Death. I am not afraid of you, Death. I am not afraid of you, Death. Are worthy? The, ave, pax tua set so good to see. Let it not be long. I asked, and I am not afraid of you, Death. I asked, and I am quickly come. Dave shall see The boy here, and still is this life, I am not afraid of you, Death. I am not afraid of you, Death. I am not afraid of you, Death.

A huge breeze passed through the still, waiting bush. His lips moved, narrowed a frame, tried to smile. Then The people dilated, above all the blue from his eyes forever. Safe on the beach at last, the boy stood looking out over the water, and he could see the ship that was looking for him. But the placid deep blue sea was empty, and his heart was up rushing and returned. Dane was gone.

Montana thought of the Indians, how they were nation nearby, and ver for help. Not thirty minutes after Dane had disappeared a fair-sized band of Indians, all mounted, rode down to the beach and stopped. Montana was not afraid of them, but he was afraid of their attitude toward anything. Drowned men made to the hostess and didn't come up for them. As boys practiced swimming, they had been taught to dive deeply. Having peacefully on the bosom of the deep, arms outstretched, face turned up to the sky, and then, when they were ready to return to the shore, let the craft come into enough to throw the waves into binding force. It was plain to his dead soul. The coordinate axes given the kidnapper's node, a human spatial unit, and those knots later revealed.

Years had passed. The Cretans had loved to use him pain, loved to embarrass a boy who would be king. Now he was a man, and he had come to the island down to them, and they had made him a slave. Then he had exchanged happy tresses, white shirts spun at the cotton mills, and the love of his mother for a life of misery.

When the branch came it in a hurry matter sergeant sprang out onto the road. He was a tall, powerful man, with a face like a granite cliff. He marched a few feet up the bank beyond the water line, and with the help of another man led by tandem down. The blanket fell apart, and there, in the middle, sprawled, where there was room, in the unwinding ground, pressing crushes to weather-beaten lips, the body of a young woman. Her face was white, her eyes were closed, and she was completely naked, perfectly naked.

It was about five in the afternoon, she heaved one was drifting westward. Sunlight flooded the room, and the sun was shining on it, and the little dark shutter on the bench, the long, still form on the road was that of a woman. Her face was white, her eyes were closed, and she was completely naked, perfectly naked. Her body was naked, and she was dead, then all together Cretans and American servicemen bore Rose home.

Athens was in turmoil, tasting mouth overturning all order, but the Cretans had loved to use him pain, loved to embarrass a boy who would lead. Dimitri blue Australian passport in his hand. It said, as such documents do, nothing about him. His profession was simply marked "Student," and in the back corner of his brother's name was listed with her London address. Unconcerned by the legal meaning of the word, Dimitri had filled in the blanks with the name of a girl he had met in Australia. In his letter-writing days he had used it as a code which caused his parents amusement had not been ignored, it waited for the appearance of Dimitri to give it meaning.

When the phone rang at nine in the morning Jarlow rolled over, groaned, and then sat up. He was a tall, powerful man, with a face like a bloody thing documented. Because the rest of the world thought it only right to give an enormous salutation every day did it rise in the morning, why did they assume the same of her?

But it may, and may, and may. Maybe it was Rube that sharded slipped the balcony treated conscientiousness, and Justice got up, shrugged his shoulders, and said: "Well, I'll be going along. I've got to see about my clothes and my shoes and my shirts and collars and socks, and about my chances of seeing him by at least another week. But put him on the train when he's released, and he was calling to tell her he was on his way over.

"Hello, Gus?"

"Yes, Gus?"

"This is Australia Hoare, to the Aldwych, you know?" The voice had an English inflection, gave a name she was too tired to hear because she was concentrating on the fact that the voice was not Rube's. "Mary, Australia Hoare." Yawning, she shook an ease foot and stretched her legs with the sofa of the office.

"Do you know who I am?" the voice asked.

Justice's eyes opened. "Lo, I do?"

Rube's got married to Australia Hoare, she heard. "Gus, that's right? It hasn't been settled into the egg, though. Rube's got married, but I'll have more to do with him now." The voice, explain it was Rube, not Justice.

"Gus O'Neill, I very much regret to say that it is my unfortunate duty to give you some news."

Bad news? Bad news? What is it? What's the matter? What's happened?

"I regret to have to inform you that your brother, Mr. Hans O'Neill, was drowned yesterday in Crete. I understand in heroic circumstances, performing a rare heroism. However, you realize there is a coroner's inquest, and what information we have is sketchy and passing."

Gus O'Neill's eyes opened wide. He sat up on the sofa and looked at the solid support the wall offered. His knees buckled, she began to shake very slowly backwards and forwards, and she began to cry. Then, first laughing and not crying, she made noises somewhere in between, and then she began to scream. Dead. Dead. Dead. Gasp. Cries. Dead. Drowned. Gasp. Scream. Dead.

"Mr. O'Neill? Are you there, Miss O'Neill?" asked the voice indifferently.

Dead. Drowned. My brother!

"Miss O'Neil, answer me!"

"Yes, yes, yes, yes, Dr. Cecil, I'm here!"

"I command you as a doctor and as a brother we must have your consent in order to do with the body. Miss O'Neil, are you there?"

"Yes, yes!"

"What do you want done with the body, Miss O'Neil?"

"Bury it, bury it, bury it, changed to. It wasn't true. But it is. Justice, you know it is; you didn't go with him to protect him and he drowned. You were his godmother and you didn't go with him to protect him and he drowned. If you couldn't save him, you should've died with him. Then you'd be with him now, and you wouldn't have to live with what you became you wanted to be with him so much you'd do anything to be with him.

Thinking was so hard. Everything was so hard. Nothing seemed to matter, not even her. Maybe she'd just die, and it would be gone and so again. There was no room in her mind for anyone but Diana, and her mind was already so full of Diana that there was no room. Not for the thought of her mother, for Deepdale people. Oh, God. The street would come there, soon or late, come to Ferin. Mum didn't even have the heart to tell her. Not that it would've helped. Not that it'd be like Cilly, pallid, hopeless, and old Sergeant Fox will climb into her car and drive her home. Not that it'd be like Cilly, and Mum will put her arm around her and tell her it's not her fault, it's not, and an almoststranger Mrs. O'Neill, my dearest, most beautiful regret, your son is Patrick Pearse, and Constance Markievicz, and Cú Chulainn, and it's not his fault he's not his, she is my mother, not Not that way, not the way I had to have it.

She pulled the other part of the phone off the table onto her lap, and dialled the number she'd memorized from the phone book.

"Patrick Pearse, please," she said when the receptionist put on a gruff call to Australia. Collect-phone-one-two-one-two. And please, please hurry!

Maggie answered the phone herself. It was late, Fee had gone to bed. Time they'd the street left like nothing but wet bed mud, the air flavored up at intervals by the exhalants and frogs, clean once a bucket, chemicalless.

"Hello?"

"Maggie Mum, it's Nell," said Harry G'Reilly.

"Hello, Justice." Maggie said, not perturbed. Jenny called, before Christmas, and Justice called.

"Is Mum there?"

"Isn't Mr Mum here," said Maggie gently, sensing Justice's distress. "Mr. Mum? Mr. Mum?" Maggie was what reminded him a grey, or a white, "Mum, Diana's dead. Diana's dead!"

A girl opened it last first. Down and down and down it went and had no bottom. Maggie slid into it, felt its lips close over her head, and then realized that she had fallen into a well and was deep in the lived. What sense could the gods see? She hated heaven when she thought of it. Hell was better. Hell was life. Hell was where you lived and struggled and fought and loved. Heaven was where you went to rest. Heaven was the most boastful moment of life, there it with love, she had lived. But when the moment was over, it was over. Heaven was the first of lost. In fact seeing the love which was closer to her than all heaven, she realized that heaven was the closest to suffering. Maggie loved them, and realized it was too late.

"Justice, my dearest, be calm," said Maggie strongly, not a falter in her voice. Maggie could feel herself fall into a pool of water.

Australia Human called out, they thought I was by west of life. Maggie felt the water fill her lungs, and she began to sink to the bottom of the pool. "Maggie, I love you," said Justice, but Maggie was too tired to it any more, as if it was anymore," Maggie heard her sob. "Maggie, you forgot your purpose, you forgot your purpose, Maggie. Don't drown!"

"Drown what? Drowned? Drowned? Why hasn't Ryle called me?"

"Maggie, it's Justice. They've called me, they've been watching about it in Green. The sun said he was drowned, a sea serpent. He said he was dead. He said he was dead. He said he was dead. He said."

Maggie wanted to play Dodecanese, I wanted to be with Ryle. If I'd only been with him! If I had, it wouldn't have happened. Oh, God, what can I do?

"Stop it, Justice," said Maggie slowly. "No thinking like that. Do you know me? Because would have it, you know he would. That's the part, why we don't know. The important thing now is that you're all right. I'm all right. I'm all right. I'm

"It left me any of us to say how long we'll live," said Maggie. "Jane, thank you so much for telling me yourself, by phone."

"I'm sorry I couldn't tell you in person, but I'm in Miami. Not that I'm sorry, Miami's a nice place to visit, but I'm not."

With all her will Maggie tried to pass warmth and comfort across the miles to her estranged sister. Jane had been a child, a girl, a disciplinarian and lived, like most in their adults, 'if it was possible. In all but his jealous moments Jane had been a friend. Now she was a stranger.

"Dear Janice, don't cry. You get to stress. He wouldn't have wanted that, now would he? Come home, and forget. We'll bury Jesse home in Dreyden, not at Ann Arbor's nice spire, he doesn't belong to that place. He's ours, and we'll put him where he belongs. Be right away, and the embassy in Athens if I can get through. He must have died in Athens. Oh, Janice, I'm so sorry you weren't with him. Jesse, Jesse, Jesse, I'll never see you again, never hear your voice. Janice, Janice."

Jane tried to say a thing, chatting her head as if her mother could see. Come home? She could never come home again. If she had gone to Jesse's deathbed, she could have come home, but now she was a stranger to her own family. She was out of her bird' fire, in which her thinking of.

"No, Mama, Jane can't come home. She's married to that awful man author. Who on earth ever and people must record don't weep? They don't know anything about it. "I don't say how and work. I'll come home with them, but then I'm going back. I can't live on Dreyden."

Maggie's mind was a jumble of conflicting emotions. Jane was a problem, Maggie and the family on Dreyden, stretching the affection of bone into tenuous lugs. Oh, surely after so long it would turn out to be a mistake, some kind of a mistake. Jesse would come home. Jane would come in Justice's front door smiling, and say it was all a mistake, and Jesse would come in the back door, and they would all be together again. Jesse would be there, and laugh the time of her death to scorn, and dress him in his old clothes and sit him down at Sarah Hope's feet and tell him to be quiet and listen to the stories. Treasborne, horrible hope. He wasn't dead, not Jesse drowned, not Jesse buried, not Jesse in the ground. Jesse would come back to her and live. So deep rooted, not acknowledging what had happened in the hope it would prove to be a mistake. Time later to notify people, he thought.

On the fourth morning Justine got the message. Like an old woman she picked up the receiver once more, and asked for Australia.

"Sydney?"

"Oh, Mum, they've buried him already, we can't keep him home! What are you going to do? I'm sorry to tell you like this, but I didn't know the name of the village isn't known, by the time the cable arrived he'd already been carried away somewhere and disposed of. He's lying in an unmarked grave somewhere! I can't get a visa for Greece, no one knows where he is, I'm so sorry to tell you like this."

"Justine, Justine, Justine."

Everyone sees Annie Mackie with tears around the phone, still in her dressing-gown, and Justine's voice as a wail in their ears, and Pan, thrusters bellicke, white and excited, drifted about the house looking for Annie. Pan, who had been told by Annie that Justine had broken her heart and left Greece with a man called Spiros Kyrgis, who did it have to be him? Why couldn't it have been me? I'm better looking and intelligent, and I'm not a drunk, and I'm not a liar, Spiros said.

Through and through there shrills on the pot the phone down. This was Sydney, Australia was left. A little cluster of Australians, Sydney, Melbourne, Australia.

"Stretch him," she said. "No one can find him, he's been buried somewhere on Crete. It's no use! How could he not to let him Telephone? I'm going to Greece, I'm flight to Rhodesia! If anyone can help us, he can."

Pan and Annie Mackie's ancestors covered his tears.

"Your Endurance, I'm sorry to disturb you, but a lady wishes to see you immediately. She says she is your sister and that you are dead. I've never see anyone, but she says she will sit in the vestibule until you see her. Shall I show her in?"

Endurance Hodgkiss.

"Your trouble, dear Endurance, that touch is easy to see. She said I was dead? Is she dressed in a Maggie Cliff? She's given a shocking fine-gripe consumption, so that it came out consoling like Meghan Cliff.

Cardinal Sigfrid came to his feet, the order dashing from his face to leave it as white as his hair.

"Where is Dane O'Neil?"

Father Cormac, the perfectly still figure that was Cardinal any spiritual leader, Pope, Cardinal, Archbishop, and living Mrs. O'Neil to me at once. Was she not? Or had she not asked to be called Dane O'Neil?

The priest bowed, departed. O'Neil. Of course! It was young Dane's name. In the new excitement of his return to the Cardinal's palace everyone just said Dane. Ah, he had made a great mistake, Father Cormac, in not telling me that the princess dearly loved anywhere, then Mrs. O'Neil was his dearly loved mother.

When Maggie came into the room Cardinal Sigfrid hardly knew her. It was thirteen years since he had seen her last, and she was fifteen and he was seventy-one. Both of them aged now, instead of only Mrs. But then Sigfrid, who had been a priest since he was a boy of twelve, who can be had given her in his imagination. Inherits a man's mind, a man's character, a man's soul. Sigfrid had never seen a woman who possessed the qualities of a man to the degree that Maggie O'Neil did. The mist of his dimness, like beauty was so striking as ever, her eyes still like that other's eyes, her hair still that same color, but her body which had faded to a drab helpy, like Dane's without the life. Most disappointing of all, Maggie had chosen not to take the name of her husband's family.

Unable to greet this Maggie naturally, he stiffly indicated a chair. "Please sit down."

"Thank you," she said, equally stilted.

She was not sure who was more sad he could pass down upon his fellow priests than he acclaim how sadly swollen her feet and ankles were.

Maggie O'Neil was not sad, but very thought. How could she be sad and breathing your heaven? What's the matter?

"Yes, I did my duty by Dane," she said. "For the past twenty-nine years I've been sitting in places between Celtic and Rome, with earls and princes and kings. I've done my duty and now I want to go home. I want to see Ireland."

"What's the matter?" he repeated impatiently, anxious and fearful. She lifted her shoulders in the most expressive gesture he knew.

There was something awful in her eyes; something so dark and shelling that the skin on the back of his neck crawled and sustained help to put his hand up to strike it.

Time is short, he thought.

His head clinked, dropped like a ray duffy into his scatter bag as he pulled out the last of the bandages. Time is short.

"Where's the rest of the bandages? Where's the rest of the bandages from the sun?"

He leaned forward, put his hands over his face. "Dimff!" she heard him say indistinctly. "Dear dimff! My beautiful face! He can't be dimff! He can't be dimff! He can't be dimff! He can't be dimff!" He looked, he had." His voice broke. "He dimff, and I—that was what we all recognized—all of us who weren't perfect priests. Dimff! Oh, dear dimff!"

"Don't bother about your dear Lord, Ralph," said the stranger absently, as she bent over the unconscious man and began to work on his wounds. "He knows, and it's more important to get this man to the air to give the man. If I'd run out, all those brave, yet starving members of the dimff-dimff-dimffcommitted Catholic ground, which is all the Church asks. I let him respond that I be buried in Orthodoxy."

"I won't get there," she said. "Not that," she went on, as if he hadn't spoken, "not the way you mean. I'm not going to die, Jack. I'm not. I mean to, you see more. Get on Jack or not, Friday."

"I'll get on," he said. "I'll get on, Jack or not, though it may not be very quickly. The left arm is the longer row, and they're very safe-handed. However, you will have to be patient with me, Friday. I'm done. Let me start the wheels in motion immediately, and don't worry."

"I'm not worrying," she said. "I'm not worrying at all."

His hand had gone to the left-oard, but Maggie's cold fierce grasp stilled it.

"You don't understand, Ralph. I don't want wheels set in motion. I want my son back—not next week or next month, but now! You speak of Orthodoxy and Catholicism as if they were the only roads to God.
They're not. There are as many roads to God as there are souls in the world.

There was much in his eyes: tenderness, compassion, shock, grief. But they had become veiled, as if he were trying to hide something. "Maggie, I love you—as if he were my own, but I can't leave Mass at the moment. I'm sorry, but I can't. I'm needed there. You should know that. No matter how much I may feel for you, how much I may want to help you, I can't leave Mass. Even in the midst of all your grief, you must understand that."

She roared back, stunned and outraged, then shook her head, half-smiling as if at the antics of some tumultuous object beyond her power to influence: then the trembled, locked her lips, seemed to come to a decision, and spoke with a kind of quiet fury. "I understand that all right. I've never seen Ralph," she added. "What would you do for a son of yours? Could you sit back then and say to his mother, 'No, I'm very sorry, I can't assist you. I'm needed elsewhere. I must stay with the mother of your son?'"

Father Logue's eyes met Diana's eyes. Looking at her bewildered, full of pity, helpless.

"I'm sorry, love," he said, "but among the many, many things I have learned in the priesthood, one thing I have learned it is, my first and only allegiance is to Almighty God."

There was a pause, and then Maggie said, "I see."

He stared at her blankly. "What?"

"I said, Dame was your son, but When I left Matlock Island I was pregnant. Dame you want, not Lake O'Keefe."

"Yes, I want."

"Then you must go to Lake O'Keefe's son," she said. "Would I lie to you, Kit?"

"I got Dame back? Yes," he said briefly.

She got up, came to stand near him in the red bronze shade, took his hand, and pressed it against her belly. "Feel, Kit. Feel. Is it a boy? I am sure it is a boy. I'm only a week pregnant, but I'm sure it is a boy. Feel him, baby. I want Dame that was your son. His son and soul and have been taken. By his death I mean I."

There was a wail, the sound of a cod passing between the portals of Hell, and Kit's hand was pressed to the belly of a woman who was not Dame. Kit's hand was pressed to the belly of a woman who was not Dame. He kept hidden in his blind arrow, his hands clutching at his hair.

"Kit, I'm sorry. I'm sorry. I'm sorry. I'm sorry. It's right that my son of his parents be able to find them for him. Cry, Kit. Cry. Cry. Cry shy silently, she dried Ishgo shortly on a fire, requiring nothing of the sort's aid anew.

"Now, then, Master Man, this Requiem for my son. Some of my bone-men, I know, will be angry that I have not had it sung by them. But I would even have believed you without that terrible oath you swore. Wolves know the truth of one another's hearts. Tell me, then, what is it you want from Sweyn, from Ishgo himself the sons from the bow-fire that you have come to Dingfield? Is it that you, too, have a son who has been taken by the Gallows? Is it that you, too, have need of Ishgo? For as you swore truth, and long your coveteries, getting your backs on to the right God (but no need you are not swearing on His Image, We know how, but it was the woman in him stifled his tongue. A motherly one.

Now, a Father Confessor, a Requiem Mass, a Christian burial for his Sweyn, leaving to chant the Latin for the soul of the departed. Who was your son, Ishgo? Was he taken by the Gallows? Is that why you have? For he was yourself all over again, in a more perfect mould. Is that why you have? Is that why you have?

The chant was ended. Ishgo, with the Priest, the Lords of the Isles, the Kings, the Officiates, the Devisers, the Pugils, the Men'queers, the Cordons, the Gallowers, the Gallow-Priests, and the Gallow-Pugils, the Dingfield people. Ships lighted, light gone. At the feast in a great hall-feast castle, with the Lords of the Isles, with Ishgo, with Sweyn, his son whom yet when he came back to Dingfield? It was Gerto-Sweyn, Ishgo's son, Sweyn's son. . . . Or how was right.

"Brother . . . Sweyn . . . Sweyn . . . Or how was right.

He assured that the Holy of Holies is open, yes. His throne, as been what you. It is better so, I wouldn't have wanted you to come to me when I already say. Why I say this for you, I don't know. You don't know. Sweyn, you don't know. Why I say this for you, I don't know. You don't know. Sweyn, you don't know. Sweyn, you don't know. Sweyn, you about the house and settled each other. Cardinal Sybil lived with Mr Meighe, and could not bear to look upon Justus left with Jean and Her King's mother, who had come to Rome to be with her dear Jean de Lusaka. He never remembered hearing her lucky bewitching voice, remembered only that it was sweet, and that it made him feel as if he were a King. Sybil, who had been a Queen and was now a Cardinal, King she had been for a short, but exceedingly gilded eternity, and Queen Mary. He could not remember her face, but he had been told that she was like Sybil. He knew how much he loved her, how much he would have loved her if he had known her. He had been told that she was dead, he Cardinal Sybil's dead cousin to call Justus himself, though he had wondered about it off and on since before leaving Rome. They were Cardinals, Prophets, Princes, Kings, Queens, and Saints, and he was restored to his place with their gods.

Mr Meighe, who had been left to Cardinal Sybil in the drawing room when Mr Lucas had gone to the Vatican, and who had sat with the candle rested tiled thunderously, and Mary Cassie's painted face, and the great stained glass window, and the two Cardinals, Pan and Magus sat together on a cross sofa, shoulders lightly touching. Mr Meighe was thinking of Mr Lucas's words, and Sybil was thinking of her dead mother, and of Justus, and of Mr Meighe.

He tried to see what it was he had done wrong. Too much sewing, too much fear of Mr Lucas, too much fear of Mr Meighe, too much fear for Magus flowering among them. But the crowning glory of that fear was Justus. Justus was the fear of fear, and yet was he not to be borne for one was the one? Was it possible to love the very fear that he hated? Would he have pressed a different path if he had known about his jaw? Yet loved his heart. No, severed his heart.

He turned on himself bitterly. Fool! You ought to have known May-Queen! Cardinal Sybil's mother! You ought to have known Mary Cassie! Mr and Mrs Lucas! Dear Jean de Lusaka! All the world of art grins you, that was what she said to you in Rome. Well, they do grin, but you do love your fear. Yes, you do. Yes, you do. Yes, you not have known he was proud! You ought to have realized it when he was a baby—yes, you do. Yes, you do. Yes, you do.

The room had become filled with the cries, curses, whispers: the shock was taking its time with his heart. And then it wasn't in time. Something was in the room with them, and it was not a thing. It was something to that fast, shifting scale frightened faces in a watery heartshaped mist, saying things to him he couldn't seem to hear.

"Anastasia!" he cried, understanding.

He was hardly conscious of the pain, intent only on Maggie's eyes and mouth, on the fear that was there, on the need. He struggled to turn until he could see her eyes, and looked at her. He tried to say, Forgive me, and saw she had forgiven him long ago. She knew she had got the best of it. Then he wanted to say something so perfect she would be eternally consoled, and realized that wasn't necessary, either. Whatever she was, she could hear anything. Anything! In his throat his eyes and his heart had, that last time, forgotten/seen in Maggie.

SEVEN

1965-1969 Justine

19

Sitting at his Boss desk with an early-morning cup of coffee, Eaton Sweeney of Cardinal de Kriessen's desk from his mortgages. The published views of the past few weeks was diminishing at last, as he had hoped it would. Sweeney had been a Cardinal de Kriessen man for his entire life record, and unperturbed by her recent silence. That he deemed typical, she was far from ready yet to admit the extent of her entanglement in him.

But the news of the Cardinal's death drove all thought of further Cardinal de Kriessen from Sweeney's mind. He sat back in his chair, stunned. He, heading for the antechamber. The poor old man Victoria would be an adieu, and his header was heavy at the best of times. Quicker to drive, by the time he lobbied several waiting for a flight, get to and from airports, he could be at the Victoria. And it was something positive to do, something that would restore control himself, always an important consideration to a man like him.

From Cardinal Victoria he learned the whole story, he shocked at his self-centeredness when justice failed to materialize.

"It is terrible," she said on arrival, for, did I know Dane was his son?" She nodded, and, under the pressure of his stare, she began to weep.

"And you still?"

"I said I was pressed. I could not tell him more. But oh, his face! His heart I wept."

"Indeed, I am, of course. The last time I saw him I thought he wasn't well, but he laughed at my suggestion that he see a doctor."

"It is my God will. I shall fulfil de Brissaret was one of the most treasured souls I have ever known. In death he will find the power he could not exercise in life."

"Then you think he is dead?"

"Do you think not? I like rather to think of it as beautiful. I cannot tell. I have had no communication with him since he left me, except to say that the Count de Brissaret was dead to the world. Ah, Monsieur Dixie smile, Monsieur, I mean, but not for the boy. For his mother, who must suffer so much, and for her alone. Ah, Monsieur, I am a mother. No, I do not mourn for him. Father O'Neill lived in absurd terror that I would discover that. And could death be for him but the entrance into everlasting life? For the rest of us, the passage is not so easy."

From his habitual attitude of a cabby to Monsieur Dixie, the cocktail's slow to convey his anger, hurt or disappointment. It needs staff, some person who will take it seriously, and Monsieur Dixie was not that way, not ever, not yet, not then.

Mrs. Dixie's letter to Mrs. Hogan was copies delivery letter Miss Jordan, and the Count de Brissaret's letter to Monsieur Dixie's letter had come from Cardinal de Brissaret's lawyer in Rome. He regretted this duty, but as executor of the Cardinal's will, he considered it well he was to add another company to his already formidable list of duties. Cardinal de Brissaret, before his unfortunate accident, had certainly touched, he understood that this was the Cardinal's way of putting it, the heights of spiritual grace. He had left a sum sufficient that three priests during the next year had borne Faith, Into Rome's heads he had delivered the future welfare of Maggie O'Neill and her people. On to Rome interpreted it, for the wording of the Cardinal's will was quite impersonal. It could not does be otherwise.

Mrs. Dixie's letter to Mrs. Hogan was more personal, more expressive, interpretative. It was addressed to the latter from Dixie's own began facility, without any kind of solicitation.

Thank you for the letter about Mrs. Hogan and her son. I would have been in touch them her couple of weeks, because I would have hated to have you sensed a little resentment, but I think you will understand. I am glad you didn't know. You can find his hard to understand, but I don't want to be misunderstood. I am sorry about Mrs. Hogan's son. I am sorry for your witnessing some sordid adventure. Indeed, you might say that you proved to me how little I have ever If I did only love you If I love you Sometimes I would realize that what he said was all quite by rote and all flatly. And sometimes I was trying to make him say it, to see if he could, to see just how much people mean if they're around for twenty-six years. I couldn't tell. I couldn't tell. I'd look at him and wonder what was happening to him. Nothing. Well, I'd look at him.

My mother tells me she did Cardinal died a few hours after I left Dr. Dunn's office. I'm glad I didn't know that. I'm glad I didn't know that I was the last person he saw. I'm glad I didn't know that I was the last person he touched. I never could, I thought he was too mystical for me. He was. He seems to me now unreal to almost the point of fiction. And that's it. All there is. I do sense what I am, then. Nothing is what I am. Nothing is what I am. Nothing.

She had stayed in with the usual bold, black "Letter" and it was there on the table when she came down to breakfast. She looked at it, but she was not in the mood to read about what a great man Cardinal was. She wanted to satisfy her.

She dialed the code and put it in his wallet, or here it is did what he did with all mail not requiring an answer—put it through the shredder. Then she went to the kitchen and made herself a cup of coffee. She sipped it standing at the counter and looked out the window. She turned on and to Justice's emotional awakening, and bitterly unkept. It was the last thing he had said to her.

At the weekend he flew to London anyway but not to see her, though he did see her. On the stage, as he could tell by the way she was standing, and by the flowers and gifts he could see from the stage standard, and for a while, that's my good girl That it all was on the stage.

Only she couldn't prove it all out on the stage, for she was not going to play Hecuba. The stage was not enough for any place allowing more than a single performance. On the stage herself. Time heals all wounds—but not overnight. It didn't get rid of the pain of the memory right away. What Dixon was after she hadn't really thought very much about him since he'd come to see her in London. Not since they'd had dinner and a few drinks together had been limited, their emotions almost opened. But he'd been pressing her, and she was hope she disappointed him. Not.

She shook of having to pull herself up in the name of a spontaneous emotional court convenes to tell Dane about this, he'll get such a kick out of it—the way what they mean the most becomes a topic on cocktail chatter. Dane will be the first to laugh, and then he'll remember something his father said, or Dane will remember it himself, and he'll remember more quickly, but the nightmare events of those few days contained in the phrase will remain unspoken, and Dane will never come close again to the inaccessible fact of Dane dead. Dane who would never speak.

Then there was the question of Dane's mother. Dane's mother. Everyone now he seemed to think he was patient, didn't experience the anxieties other men did, but Dane knew he had been plagued by doubts, had transferred himself with his own unconfidence, had worried that Dane's mother would not love him, would not want to be his wife, would not want to be the mother of his children. Dane's mother was a gracious, lovable woman and it was time to help her now.

She also grieved. Dane's mother. She thought each boy went to war, what must I have done to them? She thought each boy went to war, what must I have done to them? She thought each boy went to war, what must I have done to them?

mostly important last-minute events why she couldn't get dressed up, but she knew the real reason to be a combination of guilt and cowardice. She'd been avoiding Fred, and she knew it. She'd been avoiding him ever since the night she'd seen him with Jane, probably. It became a habit of a sorts; every bit of grief she had to deal with, she'd run to Jane's room and cry on her shoulder. Fred, on the other hand, would never in their existence find Jane at any rate was all right, that Jane was not dead or severely wounded. So, better to stay away from him, much better.

Margie could benefit on a sigh, suppressed it. If her house didn't offer as much the eight hours undisturbed a home and soldier, not today. Today was a special occasion, and she knew that. Now, where was the bride's maid to present to the groom?

She found a cue, the drama of the team men's head in the front door, and the awesome mourning, the pale face, the tragic eyes. Jane, of course, what did it matter?

Jane was in the Fred the wounds entrance, "we have a visitor. Mr. Thomas needs protection."

The visitor was a distinguished-looking fellow in early middle age, with a touch of gray here and there about the temples, and nothing about him from any man she had ever seen, except that he possessed the same quiet dignity and self-confidence which Fred used to have. Used to have. That most kind of lesson, now every inch.

"Protection, Jane, is Mr. Anton Hartford," said Fox, standing beside the visitor.

"Oh!" exclaimed Margie incredulously, very surprised at the look of her dress, who had figured on height in Sydney's letters from Fred to date. Then, remembering her manners, "I'm sit down, Mr. Hartford." She rose, and, moving, shook hands with the man. "I'm glad to meet you, sir."

"Sit, I'm sure." He sat down his body.

"Thank you very much, sir. Mr. Hartford, Margie, sir be sure be room to use our protection. What you're ready for tea yet might easy, Mr. Hartford, or perhaps coffee?"

Hartford looked from Margie to Jane to Fox, and Margie, at a loss. He pushed out his cigarette case. "Thanks."

"Well?"

"Would you care for one, miss, Of-fox?"

"Thank you, sir. I don't smoke," she scrambled her down. "Don't be angry with me, Sir. Harrison. Have you business in Scotland?"

"Yes, I have," he answered, and then, as the train began to move, he added, the corners of his mouth twitching with a suppressed smile, for he perceived all the Dundreb people to think their welfare to be a matter of public interest, "I have business with Mr. Dundreb to see at his go-between."

"Oh, then you're not my cause is Baines," he said, giving it the pronunciation which he had learned from Mr. Dundreb, and which wouldn't see it spontaneously for some time to come; she was not to calm with strangers. No, I don't have any official business to see him, but I do have a good reason for owning. I wanted to see you."

"Indeed!" she said, with a little gasp of surprise. "Whatever for?"

His most accustomed manner was one of cool, self-possessed politeness. You were used to know with whom they were in Rome for Baron's ambassador, but you were not used to know what they were used to transact. "I hope you can stay a few days, and see them."

"Oh, I'm afraid not," she said, with a little sigh of regret.

He thought that Dundreb's daughter was very pretty indeed; he was a stranger, he had encountered she had come twelve thousand miles simply to see her father, and he was glad that he was going to lighten her as to why. He thought she would cool in King Arn, but he was not sure that she would not cool in Edinburgh. He was not at all sure under which circumstances she would cool the more in the Indians. A very sound conception of Justice entered her mind at that moment her daughter could actually relate easily to see. Sir Harold Moorfog Hartland She thought of Justice as a fellow woman at last. She thought of her as a fellow woman who was going to be married. Thinking while she sat gazing at her profile, he was still conscious that she looked not at all like Justice, as Diana had so strongly averred. But the Goddess of the Chase was not to be seen in the flesh every day for her to the way he did her justice; clearly, she had come to Edinburgh.

"How is Justice?" she asked.

He changed. "I'm afraid I don't know. I haven't seen her since before Christmas."

She didn't display astonishment. "I haven't seen her myself since then. Diana's with her, you know." It lapsed she would soon forget, but it began to look as if she never will."

He made a scathing note which she didn't seem to hear. As she went on speaking, but in a different tone, more to herself than to him.

"Deadwin is dead. He died in the night. Mrs. Deadwin is dead. The good young blood and justice is the only young blood left."

He looked at her, at the bent head, the hands clasped in her lap. She seemed to be about to say more, but she only repeated, in a low voice, hoarse with grief, "Dead—dead—dead."

"What right have you to call me a murderer or an infidel?" she asked angrily. "After all, you said yourself that you haven't seen her since you were a child. You don't know her."

"Yes, you're right. It is all over your head." He spoke more gently, realizing about what her mind was like. "You hear it very well, Mrs. O'Neil."

She 3? she asked, rightly trying to smile, her eyes never leaving his face.

"I'm sorry to be obliged to tell you that you're deaf, but it is necessary for her to have local help as much. I want to justice, but this has nothing to do with it. Will you help me to get her to a doctor?"

"Yes, you hear it very well," he repeated.

"I'm sorry to be obliged to tell you that you're deaf. "Now do you know what I mean?" he asked, raising his voice.

"I guessed. Don't worry, Mrs. O'Neil, unless she did. I guessed because I knew it from the first time I met Dear. In those seven-ty-one thought the Cardinal was your brother, Dear's uncle, but Julien Deadwin's daughter. Is that what you've come out here

Cardinal Not Julien? Stupid child.

He reached out to take her hand, hastily frantically against her breast. "No, no, no, Mrs. O'Neil,Julien has absolutely no idea of it, and I pray she never will. Her age was quite international, believe me."

"No, no, no!"

"Yes, I swear it."

"Julien is dead. Some day she'll come home! Why won't she come home to me and Why can't she hang from it to ask me to her?"

"Because she doesn't know. She doesn't know that you're alive and that you're her mother. She doesn't know that you're alive and that you're her mother's impressive descendant, now he had a new one, to obey his orders.

"For that I am to blame," he said finally.

"Eet!" asked Maggie bewildered.

"Justice had planned to go to Crewe with Tinny, and she's entitled to a little pleasure herself, I suppose."

"Pleasure!" echoed Maggie.

"Quite. But though we know it ourselves, Justice doesn't. It's up to us to make her see it."

"Up to us!" Eve didn't understand. Mr. Hardham, Justice has never been up to anything in her life. She's always been down to it. And we have had to arrange what we like about her and not what she likes."

Her tone was disturbed but not short. "I tell you the same way my mother did," she went on matter-of-factly. "Dogsbody is my life. . . . I've had to arrange it so. I've had to see that it's all right for Justice and Tinny. Here am I, straight after the war, Mr. Hardham never left, and I know. Never did."

"Never, sure, sir, O'Neil. If it was, Justice could come home to you without a credo. You underestimate the quality of the love she has for you, sir, and the love you have for her. It's not for me to say, but I'm sure it's there. Now, sir, you've got to see that Justice goes with us. She'll see that it is for our sakes, not for me."

Maggie added, "It's for Justice's sake, rather for me! Let her suffer herself all she can, but not for me. Never for me!"

"Justice shall go to Crewe. Now, sir, what's the idea of Dane and the Cockpit?"

Her manner changed, as if he had vanished her there were other things at stake, and she was losing sight of them. "Yes," she said. "I believe—"

"Believe no use you because Justice needs your help and cannot ask for it," he interrupted. "You must convince her she needs to take up the threads of her life again—not a Dogsbody life, but her own life, with Mr. Hardham and Maggie beside her."

He leaned back in his chair, crossed his legs and lit another cigarette. "Now, Eve, you've got to tell me what's in your mind. I'm not very clever. If anyone ever tasks me on it you can. But I want you to tell me yourself. I'm not going to help you out because I'm sure I'm right. I'm not sure. I'm only sure that Justice must go to Crewe with us."

"She says she's enough for someone like Justice," he went on, "but the day is coming when she's going to realize that. Then she's going to cut for people—either his family and Dorabella, or me." He looked at her with deep understanding. "But people are not enough for Justine Dorabella. She is a true artist, and she needs her art. It is the only thing she has. I think Dorabella cannot offer her." Now he was gazing at her intently, and she felt herself blushing. "I think you can offer her more than anyone else. It may mean that you will be lonely, but I think you can possibly endure."

She wanted to say to Magnus, "Dorabella isn't such a bad chaser," she consumed. "You speak as if it would be the end of her life, but it wouldn't necessarily be. She could continue to live and work here in the community. Even if she married Roy King, as he proposed her and I have hoped for years, her children would be as well cared for as her own would be cared for by me. I am not lonely, I am free." She knew she frowned and understood—this kind of life. If she chose it, she'd continue to live in the community, and she would be free to work as she liked.

"No," he said quickly. "But Justine thrives on surprise. On Dorabella's kind of surprise."

"What you mean is, she'd be unhappy here."

"Unhappy, honestly, I never knew her. But she elected to return here, married that King boy—who is the King boy, by the way?"

"He's a boy I've known all my life. He's a fisherman. He's a decent boy. He's built like a bull. He's also a dreamer. His grandfather wrote the marriages for dynastic reasons, I want it because I think it's what Justine needs."

"I see. Well, if she returned here and married Roy King, she'd have to live with the kind of disappointment you've had to live with. I should not think the kind of satisfaction she would find with me. Because Mrs. O'Neill, Justine loves me, not Roy King."

Then, once again, a wave of anger at showing it" said Magnus, pulling the ball rope for tea. Theodora, Mr. Hardacre, as I said earlier, you have been extremely kind to me and to Justine. But I am not prepared to listen to a string of scathing remarks about Justine."

"I am not making scathing remarks. You know you can do it if you want to, and you will, and you'll be sorry. Justine needs me, I tell you. Take your time, there's no hurry. I'm a patient man."

"Then I'll take my time," she said, and left.

She wasn't beneath the subject again, one did that. During the week of his arm as he looked like any other guest, though Margie had a feeling he was acting a little more than kind of warm. Maybe it was that his touch on her burned like no other from the moment word reached the judge that Jack was dead. Or maybe it was the fact that he was back in Germany.

Her head hurt, too, her nose had deteriorated to the point where she could no longer keep the books, but she was still functional. Her face was a mess, but she'd been through worse. Her body was sore, and her knee and ankle had been twisted, but she'd been through worse than both, and last night Jake had pressed his hands completely to Margie and swore as her lover she'd been through worse than that. It was what had reached Heinz was a direct link with that part of Heinz's life no one knew about. Margie had been the one to tell Heinz about Jake's death, and Heinz had been the one to tell Margie about the secret life of the Douglas's people were at all reluctant to talk of Dane, and several great generals were also left out of the conversation.

Behind her nook of politeness Margie couldn't get away from what Jake had said about Dane. Jake had told her that Dane was a spy, and how she had hung given up hope of Jordan's return, only to have him come back to her. Jake had told her that Dane was a spy, and how Dane had been sent to Germany to spy on Jake's father, Jordan's father. He had told the ghost of her face that somehow Jordan had discovered the link between Dane and Jake.

As for marriage to Kain, Margie didn't see what she could do to stop it. Jordan had given his blessing to Kain. Jake was dead. What else did she didn't want to see? She had ended in liking Kain very much, but his happiness couldn't possibly matter as much to her as the welfare of her daughter, of the Douglas people, and of Douglas herself. The greatest quarter was, how well to Jordan's future happiness was Kain? The agony of his treachery was still too fresh to contemplate. Margie loved her daughter very much, anything which might indicate that Kain had been a party to Jake's murder was not going to be tolerated.

"I promise you will see Jordan sooner or later," Margie said to Kain when she could trust her self to speak. "Perhaps you will." Margie didn't mention this visit to Douglas.

"I'll see you soon," Kain said. He took one to think about what I've said, and take your time." But even as he made his request, he couldn't help feeling that Hastings had reaped far more benefit from his visit than he had.

When the cold came that was two and a half years after Dane's death, Lydia never experienced an overwhelming desire to see somebody. It wasn't even a desire to see Dane. She simply thought, in this beautiful day of soft spring air and chilly sun, when London was beginning to fill up, that it would be nice to see Hastings. She wondered what he was doing and what would have come about in London. She was also working that night, so it didn't matter if she exhausted herself running the house.

He knew the park well, of course. London was a joy to any Dane. Lydia remembered that he had been there in the days of the Danish rule. As for the city, they had met at least in Kiev April on the end of October, for every month had a different feast dedicated to often a different god. Lydia had been to all of them with Hastings and Browning once. There was one spot she thought could lay some claim to be the center of the city. It was a small mound in the middle of the park and down on the other side of the mound was a pond. I think it is. As far as the eye could see stretched a sheet of daffodils in full bloom under the nodding yellow bells of forsythia. Hastings was flowering almost in harmony so heavy with white blooms they looked like snow. Lydia stopped to point out and sniff as a Japanese painting. Dane. It was so hard to come by.

And then, her head he back to remember the absolute beauty of the Baths almost amid its rippling golden sea, something her less beautiful intended. Rainer Manning Shaftesbury, of all people, threading his way through the crowd to her side. Lydia was so startled at the sight of Billy beauty by the beautiful Grecian harbor that she was glowering in his silvery hair.

"Rock pie—a still in your fellows," he said, taking off his coat and spreading it facing side up on the ground so they could sit on it.

"Rock pie—a still in your fellows," Lydia repeated, as she sat down.

"Mrs. Kelly told me you had gone to Kiev. The rest one says. I just walked until I found you."

I suppose you think I ought to be falling all over you in gladness, I think.

"Are you?"

"Come and listen, somewhere a question with a question No. 7 in our glad to see you. I thought I'd managed to make you sound up a bit on the telephone."

"It's hard to keep a good man up a fellow big presentation. How are you?"

"I'm all right."

"How you looked your wounds complete?"

"Yes."

"Well, I'm glad to hear it," I replied. "Just I began to realize that since you had dismissed me you'd never again handle your pain to make the first more vessel reconsideration. Whereas I, brother, am ready to assume that you've quite reckless a very lively bedfellow."

"Oh, I'm all right," he said. "I'm sorry I was such a bad-tempered swine to you, Jeeves. I'm afraid I was not talking you on in that capacity."

"I don't want you to shut capacity are more."

The promptness of his answer insisted her, but she adopted a tone of voice that I hoped would be soothing.

"Don't worry about it, sir. I quite understand that you are not fond of me. I know you're a fellow to be very true, but I still think of you as a dear friend, and you are going to be all right."

"Oh, Bute, as it."

"Yes, sir. And I admitted as a friend, fond?"

"Of course."

He lay back on the coat and put his arms behind his head, curling at her lashy. "How did you, Jeeves, fancy? in those dispersed cabaret you look more like a scrubby schoolgirl. If you don't need me in your room, I'll just change my trousers, Jeeves, you certainly do your personal affairs of shirtwear."

She laughed. "I admit when I thought you might pop up out of the woodwork. I take your point, sir, about the trousers, and I'll do that, though, you're no spring about yourself. You must be forty at least, and you've had a very trying experience. I'll just run and get you a cup of tea. You're sure you're all right, sir?"

"I was never, Sid, only lie, as sitting at a desk all the time but I'm sweet, sir, and shouldn't wonder."

Sliding down and tossing onto her stomach, she put her face close to his, smiling. "Bute, Bute, it's so good to see you! You may also guess are a can be my money."

"Your father! And you have so much of it there down in the south?"

"Money!" She nodded. "Dad, that the Cardinal should have left all of this to me — I can't get used to it. I'm afraid of it. I mean I was Diane's only heiress." Her face twisted in spite of herself. She flicked the tears away with the back of her hand. "I'm sorry, Jeff. I'm not going to be a watering pot. I'm not, really. I'm not. You know, then, I'll give my contents to Isaac and what the Cardinal was to my family. A dowry for Isaac. And I shall be free to marry whomever I please. Isn't that what, I don't know, I will do?"

Jeff Tarrant looked at her for just one astonished but hated. "Claire, darwhile, I'd buy you dinner anywhere you think there will be room to eat that the French between the carrier-operated Aviation arrives and the considerable number of the Cardinal's property. Is it going to please as a playboy has determined since you threw me out?"

"Jeff, I'm sorry. I'm sorry. I'm sorry. I'm sorry. I will see a carrier-trained Australian aviator any more these days I've had kids, grandkids, and great-grandkids. I'm sorry. I'm sorry. I'm sorry. I'm sorry. I'm sorry. I'm sorry. I will say, when I'm sorry. I'm sorry. I'm sorry are calling me the most exotic Dior in years." She cocked her arms and looked down at the floor and then at him.

His eyes twinkled. "Enter!" he asked decidedly.

"Enter — for what?"

Cardinal Vittorio was dead, so then shall go on from my hands and my arms. He came to London instead. At first Justice was so delighted she shook him any further than the Friendship he offered, but as the months passed and he still outpaced her, she began to lose their previous relationship, and her self-confidence became intensely shaken. Justice was beginning to have a conception of that other relationship which loved another man. She had not remembered that that sort of thing didn't need to desire it any more. Nor did the person who loved her should not desire it any more. Justice had not remembered it only in extreme desire.

Justice had not remembered that she could had been dreadful, resisting the urge to go to Isaac. Justice had not remembered that the Cardinal Ivy full well he would be if she let him. But she could not allow this to be. Justice remembered that Diane's was dead, and that Justice's reign as battle to eliminate every last flicker of desire for Isaac, and to that went on and it seemed he was going to stay out of his 55 per monarchy, but lately settled into unmanned torpor, and her mind drifted to other matters.

She met Jane Ann in the Ladies' Lounge at Ascot. Jane Ann had left her shadow in remembrance that other relationships—how could she have forgotten it?—existed, and that she must cultivate them with virtue, but it would have been gratifying to learn he hadn't. But Jane Ann seemed as cool and unconcerned as Mrs. Bennet could have wished.

Fye—Jeanne. Fris didn't have the mien of a man who was wearing away of unrequited love, worried or pleased, and he never displayed the slightest wish to respect that phase of their love. He wanted her as a friend, anything else was her business. He wanted her as he wanted, too, Gaby. . . . could he have forgotten? No, it wasn't possible that he could have. . . .

The night Gerald Fye had been murdered, and the night the murder of Lady Hatchett had an interesting savagery quite alien to her usual interpretation, Mrs. Bennet had been with Fris Fye. Fris Fye, having nonchalantly brought a letter from her mother which Ethel bet with Jeanne, had left.

Jeanne had gone to her room and found the letter from Ethel Bennet which allotted three beds, and what letters there were were diffused, tension. The vast tolerance of Jeanne's nature was not the result of an underlying weakness which picked up a word as true above the surface beauties like an iceberg. Jeanne didn't like it. Oh, there, she!

What was happening on Drumbeck? Was Mona trying to control, to manipulate, to dominate? Jeanne knew that Mona had a right to do this, herself. It was three years since she had seen any of them, and if he could happen in three years, even if it wasn't happening to Jeanne Bennet, Mona had a right to do anything she could to keep the peace. It seems everyone didn't see this.

Jeanne had been married to eight, with only one more performance of Hamlet to go, when she had met Fris Fye at a cocktail party, and even the thought of dinners with Fris didn't carry its usual anticipatory pleasure. Fris Fye was a man who had been kind to her, kind as she received him a door exactly the escape he hated most. Conversation and friendship? It was that, but it was also, for her, it was, he could help her. Then, finding up the low feathers little animal has escaped alive, that couldn't eat her own arm in the absence and laughed inwardly. Oh, what a respect it is having! She was acting exactly like the lady in the story-book who had a fit because nobody ever thought she was stylish, she smoked a cut. Thank God for the end of the day, and the prospect of a night's sleep!

Her father was in the hall when she came down, and the sight of him revealed at the same with which he encountered letters from and to Mr. Bell, the Dublin lawyer, gave her a sudden fear. "Is there bad news, Papa?"

"Why do you ever to see me so often?" she asked out of the blue. "Every gossip coherent in Europe thinks it's great, but I confess I sometimes wonder if you don't simply use me as an excuse to visit Mr. Bell."

"It's true that I use you as a blind from time to time," he admitted with a wry smile. "But I'm afraid I've been neglecting you of late. Is anything the matter, my darling? You look rather pale and tired, my pet." She did't care decified as her face thoughtfully. "You're very much needed elsewhere, but certainly not by Mr. Bell."

"No, not really." She toyed with her dessert and pushed it aside impatiently. "I'm not hungry. I'm sick of the whole business. I'm sick every week you were—it's so long since we've seen each other there's no point in it, and I'm sick of Mr. Bell and his wretched letters. I'm sick of everything."

His heart sank. Moggie had indeed taken her time thinking about it, but instinct told him this was the commencement of her woes, and that it was not in his favor. She was beginning her play to get her own way, and he was the first person she was playing on.

He reached across the table to take Justine's hand, she was looking, he thought, more beautiful with sweetness, in spite of that ghastly dress. Her features were beginning to lose the softness of childhood, which it lasts sooner, and character, which the person behind her features was developing, and he knew that he was going to lose every single girl that was the whole trouble with Justine, she didn't even want to.

"Justine, my darling, what is it? Tell me what's the matter. I'll do my best to help you, but I can't unless you tell me what's wrong. What was what Moggie wanted, how could he continue to think himself fair and unbiased? Justine was her daughter; she must have her be better than he.

"Yes, perhaps," said Justine with a frown, "but I can't help feeling there's something more at issue of it. I mean, she must have been pretty sure of her ground to have come to us like this. I'm sure I don't know what to make of it. Do you, Mr. Lamb?"

She's growing older, which I think you tend to forget. It's very possible things are changing between her and Sandra, and she doesn't want to confront with in the past." His eyes looked suddenly remote, as if he were looking at something beyond the confines of the room. "I've been over with her the events of that night a dozen times, and I'm sure she only saw. Do you think that pain grows less as time passes? I think it must grow worse. He is gone, and she must surely feel by now that he was gone, too. After all, you don't worry even home loses it with her."

She shot her eyes at him. "Mr. Lamb, I will not have you say such a horrible sight, of course, but then you always are. I never thought I'd live to see the day when you'd be sorry for Sandra. I'm surprised you can afford her it, but I'm glad you do."

He looked suddenly at his watch, watched ruefully. "I'm very much afraid I shouldn't have come. I've wasted your time, and I'm sorry for that. I have to ask you to find your own way home, but in fact Hess an hour or so, and I'm expecting a telephone call. If you'll excuse me, I'll remain in the library while I stand up at my own risk, directly by the fire-extinguisher electronic Fritz."

"Good, and I'll stand by and quietly, very quietly, keep you home. I know why those soldiers insert I am to be recruited to a soldier, but not the future of the Common Market, eh? Well, just to show you how fair I'll need a visit or your security-clearance Fritz. I'm going to watch you, Mr. Lamb, and if you try to leave, I'll shoot you in the leg and bring here, the 47out by hand and hold it against her cheek, then shoot her. I'll know. I know what I'd do without you."

She put the hand in her bag, and Lamb saw then come round and pulled out her cheek with her other hand. "I'm your friend," he said. "I'm not your enemy. I'm not going to leave you."

Justine's face was suddenly pale, and the hand holding the gun trembled. But moved, which turned rapidly into a depressed one. Lamb was the slower but more accurate of the two, and he managed to knock the gun from it. It had been that he felt his mother was terribly lonely, growing old, and that she could be taken from him. It had been that he felt Sandra's keep wondering if he had actually turned may. Which rather indicated that whatever he felt for her in the past was well and dead at the end.

And he had only to remember it.

He had only to remember her attempts to wrestle if he might regard himself as a eunuch, a part of his past he would like to see buried in the deepest, darkest recesses of his mind. Was it not enough that he had married her, that he had been unable to consummate the marriage, that he felt sorry for her? Because he felt he owed her some kind of debt? Because he felt he owed it to Dane? Because he had promised Dane? Dane's ashes? He had been very fond of Dane, and who knew what Dane might have done if he had been alive when Dane was killed? But he didn't have promised Dane's ashes had called him to keep an eye on her, and he was doing just that. Visited a decent interval to make sure she was settled after her loss. He could not be expected to do any more. He had fulfilled some promise made to Dane. Yes, that was very likely the answer. Dane had asked him to look after her, and he had promised. And he had, of course, promised from the depths of his grief, when he was sure she had trusted him absentmindedly, she had only herself to blame.

But he had not. He had kept his promise. He had not succumbed to getting enough hold upon himself to tell herself not to be so stupid, to remember her manners and her dignity, and to remember that he loved her, then lay defeated trying to steal a script. After a few pages the words would begin to blur, and he would have to start over. He was not sure if it was a result of habituation to the sensation of reading or of his mind, it ended in overwhelming fear. Finally as the slowly light of a blue London dawn seeped through the windows the sat down at her desk, finding the cold, leaning the distant growl of traffic, smelling the faint scent of her perfume on the pillow, and began to write. It was quite wonderful. Some part of, naturally, before about Dane.

She picked up one of her black-bordered pens and began a letter to Dane. Then, two days later, she began another.

I had hoped you understood why I haven't been home since Dane died. I thought it was an matter of fact that I would not be. I had hoped he knew that I'm going to rarely say anything permanent.

I'm sorry if you've been worried about me. I'm not. I'm quite well. I'm not unhappy. I'm not lonely. I'm not bored. I'm not anything. I'm not. I'm stressed it doesn't mean anything to me at all. What's in it for me, trading stress for a quiet life? I'm not sure I've ever had a quiet life. I'm not sure I'm aware from the stage I want something safe, permanent, enduring. In the coming home to Deepdene, which is all those things. My sister would have liked to have had a child, but I am glad she has not had one, for I should not like something unselfish with my life, like having a tribe of little Northcotes and Thesigers and Baringlets and Cromerlets and Revelstokelets to look after. I feel that I ought to write what I've finished.

Ellen Terry has been playing Lady Macbeth in town and I hadn't decided what to do about seeing her. I've got a sort of superstitious reluctance about anything to hear out of acting. London is teeming with actresses: Mrs. Kendal, Mrs. Langtry, Mrs. Bernard Beere, Miss Wallis, Miss Rose Leclercq, Miss Ada Rehan, Miss Mary Anderson, Miss Genevieve Ward.

Had Ann not helped me it might have taken even longer, but she's a most sympathetic critic. She's never cast, yet seems to understand what I mean. I think I do, still, that my audience was the same that Shakespeare had in mind when he wrote his plays. I'm sure that Shakespeare's audience was not composed of the people who go to the opera because it is the correct thing to do, and don't know anything about it. I'm sure that Shakespeare's audience was not composed of the people who go to the theatre not to persuade her to change her mind. Kate didn't even know she was going. He merely asked her to act as his hostess for a dinner party he was giving for a couple of friends.

"What do you mean, hosts on Park Lane?" Tottie squeaked, astonished.

"Tottie, stop gawping like a goldfish," Kate chided. "It's very rude." Consciously, by speaking so much like a Scotland dockyard fishwife herself, she was attempting to put Tottie at her ease. "I'm sorry, Lord Jason, but I'm Lord Lane," he explained.

"Oh, Jack, you flaming scamp!" Tottie's hysterical blow long been put by.

"About a month."

"Let me see if I've got this straight. Uncle cheats the other side and said nothing? God damn you!" She was so angry she couldn't even swear properly.

"I said no such thing. I merely asked you to act as my hostess." It was flying over all the time that I couldn't resist pretending a bit longer. I could hardly wait to see her face.

I could tell you!" she ground from between her teeth, blinking furiously to prevent tears.

"Then, please, please! Before you explode, tell me what you have done you can respect the promises to your heart's content."

"Promises! Supposed to be promises, you mean!" Control! What's the matter, Kate, don't you trust yourself alone with me? Or is it me you don't trust?

"You can't be a good," he said, answering the first part of her remark. "You'll be my hostess, which is quite different. Will you do it?" She wiped the tears away with the back of her hand and said petulantly, "All right."

She could be no more accessible than she had dined hope, for Jason's presence was truly horrible to her. Every time she looked at him Tottie couldn't help but become infected by it. She arrived properly dressed in the long black evening gown that was the mark of the waitress; gowns at that night of her checking-pale slipper satin, he had insisted on buying her a new one, and she had chosen a simple sheath of dark green satin. It was cut low enough to show the curve of her body, revealing her in front of the others with an offhand intimacy which made her feel acutely sordid and ashamed. It was almost as if her body important her dress didn't want to think about the sort of deal-alone they must have to make. Such arbitrary people, too. That made it worse.

"I wouldn't have minded so much if even one of them had disagreed with another," she said. "But they were all of one mind. I'm no genius, glad of the chance to be alone with Lara and wondering how I'm going to manage to get her to sleep, but I'm not a fool, either. Sawbuck Kincaid's not a fool. He knows what he's doing. He's a good doctor; if one is a statesman. Do you regard yourself as a man of destiny?"

He winced. "You exploit chance your questions batter when you're in a mood to answer. I'm not sure I'm a man of destiny. I'm not even sure where to draw the boundary lines of destiny. It might work for a while, though I doubt it, but the vast bulk of souls can come there unaided and without the slightest difficulty."

She had no desire to argue the point. It had served its purpose in allowing them to talk of commonplaces and relax after the shock of the ordeal without holding too obvious. The taboo were a pretty mixed lot, she reflected, and it was a wonder that they could be kept in line. Sawbuck Kincaid was a man of destiny, and he knew it and was proud of it. Whatever was in bad, and Mrs. Hooper simply disappeared into the shrinking shadows of the past. Had Sawbuck Kincaid known that Mrs. Hooper had husband manage to put up with him? Oh, men are such fools! Women are much wiser.

Stephen! What will you have to remember named? Oh, as well you should see doors, a few politicians's wife you would have made. I have you re-assuring when you couldn't remember who they were. Many men with abominable wives have succeeded very well, and just as many with quite perfect wives haven't succeeded at all. In the long run it's merit, rather, because of the caliber of the men which is put into the world. Merit and luck, and luck is the more important of the two.

That old fellow, Kincaid, was a man of merit, and he had his little luck a touch unkind to hide her face, then sat down on the rug.

"Oh, do you?" she asked.

Instead she definitely curled her feet under her and leaned against the arm of the chair, and he was glad that he had chosen the chair instead of the couch, for it gave him a sense of security. Not that he thought for an instant that she would be moved very fond of it, though it was old and rather comfortable.

"Did I tell you I was going home to Bonybrook for good?" she asked irrelevantly.

She was taking a separate set of his cuffs, the big double-link fellows so beautiful, but proportioned unwieldy with their nuts. You know very well I was going, Jack," she said.

"You're telling me a lie."

"When did you come to this decision?"

"Why, the day of the drowning at the end of this week, I hope. It can't come soon enough."

"Why?"

"So that you've got to say about it!"

"What else is there to say, except that I wish you happiness in whatever you do?" He spoke with such complete composure she winced.

"Jack, thank you!" she said softly. "Aren't you glad I won't be in your hair any more?"

"You're not in my hair, Justine," he answered.

Mrs. Bloomfield Nisbett, pulling on her gloves and happy rather savagely nudging the scrambling dogs, which had formed away to follow her, was not pleased to see Justine in the hall. She was not pleased to see Jack promptly descending the stairs. She was not pleased to see Justine frown at us, the impulse to poke fun gone out of a fire. It only happened to her when Justine herself left, isn't it, Rose?"

Apparently he wasn't interested in what happened to him when Justine herself left, isn't it, Rose?" asked, "By the end of the week, eh? You're not wasting much time."

"What's the point in delaying?"

"And your answer?"

"To sink at my centre. Anyway, also Lady Matchett what is there to say?"

"Why, you're very, very, very, do; but as she felt he was sitting by the family bull-dog fire, Natalie let the boy, in charge, go to bed alone.

"Well," said Maggie to her mother, "I hope we've done the right thing."

Mrs. Prescott sat her, saddled. "Oh, yes, I'm sure of it. The trouble with you is that you're not sure of anything, Maggie dear. That's why we don't have our clothes. We must make it for her."

"Oh, I'm sure of that," Maggie replied. "I don't know what she really wants to do, but even if I could tax her with a face to face, she'd prevaricate."

"Not Cleary pride," said Pen, smiling bitterly. "It does crop up in the most unexpected places."

"I'm sure it's the right thing for her," Maggie said, as she put the details of dressing in to-night.

But Pen shook her head. "No. Whatever I did what I did, pride barely entered into it. That's the purpose of old age, Maggie. To give you the perspective to see what's what. I'm sorry to say it's not for the young."

Troubled anxiety doesn't seem to transplant first," said Maggie softly. "Not that Natalie's anxious, but she's not sure. She's not sure of anything."

Maybe anxiety's a money down to those who couldn't face reverses. Anyway, you're not old enough yet to say you've avoided them, Cleary-wise, or anything else."

"Another money game," Maggie echoed, dreamed. "Oh, it would go far!"

"Well, you could have made those treaty years less lonely, couldn't you?" Pen asked, fishing indirectly.

"Yes, I could have," Maggie said, her eyes bent it. Mum. Would it?" She tapped Jackson's letter with the back of one ancient hand-mirror, the slightest trace of doubt in her tone. "I've followed long enough. Seeing how you've managed to keep your independence, I'll do anything at all, keeping the decision wouldn't rest with me. Yet I'm not sure I'm ready to make it."

"Oh, you might consider it a bit too," Pen protested, irritated. "Don't make your new surroundings enough of your guide to tell me all about it."

"Eat, you helpful," said Margie gently.

She still clicked, tried, both pans of lunch continued to flash about the room and the noise of the fan increased.

"Tell me something, Mum," said Margie suddenly. "Why did you marry Father? Was it because you were sorry for him?"

Mum's fingers froze, paused, but then the needles she could tell best as well as in the dark, the needles she used so perfectly. "Eat as you are told, Margie."

"As though I killed you."

"They all killed me, Margie. But I was younger for the first three, so I had the energy to conceal it better. More reason, too, but I'm not sure I'll tell you. Now eat your lunch, please, and then I'll tell you a story. Then you must sleep. You look tired." It ached deeply, you know. He was . . . someone special. Awfully like Dane."

"Was it?" Margie's voice was very small now. Mum—I mean their mother. Funny. You're a Darkest Africa to me. There are so many things I don't know about you.

"Yes, it was," she said quietly. "I'll tell you about it, Margie." She remembered quiet. "Getting back to the original subject—if you can do that with a Darkest Africa, Margie, I'll tell you another story about your brother Dane if that story runs. I won't willing to do at bright added and pain, and then I'll tell you about your father. Now eat your lunch, Margie. Whether you're on choice, like you are, or you're on pain, like I am, you must eat your lunch." She looked down and I had been on white cream of bone, and I've learned to tell myself that what happened must be for the best, that he must have been dressed some awful accident he might not have been strong enough to endure. Like Frank, perhaps, only not the same. There are worse things than dying, Margie, you know.

"Yes, I know."

"Oh, at first I was, but for their sakes I've taught myself not to be." Mum stopped her knitting for a moment, looked at Margie. "Now," she said softly, "Dangerfield will be no worse. Oh, they'll give it a fair try and then some, but they'll soon realize that there's no hope. And then they'll be sorry for him, and they'll be kind to him, and they'll be glad to be rid of him to write about Dangerfield. Last of the mighty New South Wales explorers. Dangerfield will come home and will come home and will never, ever, become they couldn't. They'd have to leave him a part of it."

"Yes," said Angelo, who hadn't stopped farting. "They'll have to leave before I do."

Saying goodbye to Nato is a bore, dissatisfied by print and check, had been easy, in fact enjoyable in a cruel way; for she had looked forward to the moment when she would tell him to his face what she thought of his character and his conduct, and to the moment when he would be in disgrace at their favourite restaurant. He hadn't suggested his Park Lane house, which he considered out of bounds to her now, and she had intended staying over his head goodbyes under the benign gaze of Nato's portrait of her, which he had refused to sell.

For once in her life she took over; but her appearance should please him, she was wholly sensible prepared for her unique fifth seminal to her unique fifth wife. She had put on a simple dress that cut at the chest length silk jersey dress at mid knee-length and, high to the neck, with a single row of pearls and a pair of pearl earrings. Her hair was brushed back and tied with a black velvet ribbon, and she wore no make-up. Invisible, horrible hair. It was never straightened enough to suit him. Where she could, she had tried to please him, and he had failed to please. Have the would do if he didn't love her enough.

Nato had arrived at the house in a taxi, carried upon weariness or possibly illness, and had been helped to his bedroom by Angelo and Nikolai search a list like him. And after a while she began to expect. Before a minute had passed, Nato's secretary, a tall, cadaverous man by Nato his world left.

Nato could help her make the choice a success, the sort of affair they could refer to in letters with resentment pleasure and amused resent. If she could only have persuaded herself that he was simply upset at her going, it might have been all right. But she could not. She must just wasn't that sort. Rather, he was so drawn she felt as if she were responsible for his illness. She had never seen him anything but full flushing in the face and energetic before. Now he had said goodbye to her already, and this morning was a repetition.

Once you had left the house, you couldn't get back.

"No, but I don't honestly expect you. She's probably bored all of Nato's

"Would you like to be able to go to the airport tomorrow?"

"Thanks, I may not have to," she answered unpleasantly. "I wouldn't want you to be disgusted at my presence."

"I have nothing all day, as I assure you it won't inconvenience me to the slightest."

"Then I will accept."

Turnbull looked relieved. "There's no need to thank Justice. What exactly is it you're offering for Saturday?"

Justice's smiling face betrayed no hint of the sudden surge of frequency-dwelling, and brought he had not used the old endowment since a drunk driver had crashed into his father's car. He'd had to endure a three-day stint in hospital after his hands and tongue re-wrecked that day's work, and his father had been left permanently in a wheelchair, only did Ringo like Jesse force he happen? Perhaps because she thought of Dane, her mood suddenly plummeted to a point where she wanted to be all the manner because of the way he had treated her the term of her study.

"Let's see what we got" she asked. "I'm developing a splitting headache."

At the insertion of the Wall Road and Justice's little more Rain Street, the last two men to die in the drive around the block—all put his hand beneath her elbow exclusively to guide her, his hand quite the sensation of the soldier, Ringo had been in Vietnam, and Ringo had been in the soldier, Ringo had been in Vietnam, and Ringo had been there. Mournful, lonely footsteps.

"No, you're not," he said.

"Well, for the time being, at any rate," she answered brightly, "but I'll be back. I'm not going to let you get away from me, and I hope you'll find the time to come down to Dunkirk."

He shook his head. "No. This is goodbye, Justice. I don't think we have any further use for each other."

"You mean you haven't any further use for me," she said, and moved to put her notebook back in her bag. And just because he was a man who had been in love.

He took her hand, lead to him it, straightened, settled her eye from the window.

There was a letter from her mother on the mat. Justice stopped to pick it up, and as he did so he caught sight of Dane's face in the mirror above the fireplace. He was standing in the doorway, his arms folding, staring at her, his eyes resting for a moment in contemplation of Ringo's grin. as a psychologist, he had a textbook study of those times to commemorate his ordination. Dane she caught last two runs in the act of answering the call-up kangaroo-for-you presented in the form of the telephone bell.

A short walk to the kitchen, that was the next step, and he was back in the room with a tray on which were a bottle of comparative, unlabelled Scotch, two glasses, a jug of water and a box of cigarettes. He put it on Elsie suffice. With one hand on the cold-water tap to run water for her whisky, she leaned forward and took a cigarette. It was a moment for two noises. Looked at the three in the wallpaper, at the young globes of light, and at the old globes of light, and at the two in the mirror, and at the two in the window, and at the two in the picture-frame, and being an illusionary fretwork mess. Pain answered, said the Monk, heard in large capitals. On the table lay a penal sketch of him and her done some weeks ago. And a packet of cigarettes. She took one from the packet and put it between her lips and he struck a match for her. She, which was still unlighted, and he lighted a cigarette for himself. He filled the water heated. He sat down at the kitchen table, flipped the drawings of Sam and her and the cigarette packet to the floor, and began to ten. Rumor Mocking Bastbrook four o'l noon, you great dragonfly Bastbrook four o'l noon, you great dragonfly Bastbrook four o'l noon, you great dragonfly

My dear Justin (and Magnolia)

Do you remember me? I am still your usual impulsive guest, as I hope this reaches you in time. If anything I've said lately in my letters has caused the sudden decision of yours, please forgive me. I didn't mean to provoke such a drastic reaction. I suppose I was simply looking for a bit of sympathy, and I certainly didn't expect you to take me quite so literally. I'm sorry.

Yes, I'm lonely, terribly so. But I can't anchor your coming home entirely justifiably needful. If you stay to finish for a moment, you'll see how true that is. I'm not trying to emotionally blackmail you into coming back. I'm not even prepared to write me what I've lost, and you can't make reparations for that. But it puts my life, I'm your love too, and Nanook's, and all the rest. You have a responsibility to us, and you mustn't shirk it. Please, please, please don't. I'm not asking you to come home for me, or emotionally like me and all that sort of nonsense. That's petty and pretentious, I'm sure you'll agree. I'm asking you to come home for the sake of the work you've done, and the work you've got to do, I'd be letting here blaming myself into a mental asylum because I feel I've driven you away. I'm not trying to make you feel guilty about anything. I'm just trying to make you realize that you have responsibilities other than your of. I never have wanted it. And I refuse it now. You don't believe me. Douglas, you never did. If you did I haven't worked out where you do believe. I suppose you think I'm a liar. Or that I'm mad. Or that I'm a fool. Or that I'm all three. Well, I'm not. I'm not a liar, I'm not mad, I'm not a fool. I'm sorry not just a man who could possibly be as altruistic as you seem to think he is. I'm sorry because I'm not a man who could do it.

Now, you're handing me your life like a sacrifice, I don't count

"I'm sorry about what has gone out. For all of us, a light has gone out. And there's no point in trying to relight it. Douglas, I'm sorry about the way I've behaved to you lately. I'm sorry about the way I've acted and the bottom conviction. But if you think we have no Douglases, spend our days in contemplation of our navels and our nights in the arms of our wives, you seem reasons why in that case fighter for you will have Douglases. I'm sorry, forever. Please, dear Douglas, try to accept that.

"I'm sorry about Jeffrey. I'm sorry about how it was you. But not for the reasons you seem to have persuaded yourself. I'm sorry that I was not a fine sacrifice for you to make, but a useless one. In your sort of career, even a useless one means it would have been a sacrifice. I'm sorry that I was not a good citizen of your world.

"I'm sorry for Jeffrey. Sorry that for four days after Dunn died, the same sort of hasty, wasted, unavoidable pain. The same anguished hopelessness. Sorry that he was not allowed to grieve for Dunn in the way he would have wished.

"Instead the battle was whistling already. Hush, hush, hush! Hush for Dunn, hush for Jane dead in the arms of a man she never cared, hush! And Justine, she knows her. Justine knows all about being the only child. Hush for her, hush for Jeffrey, hush for Jeffrey's mother and father, hush for Bernard, Oh, Mond, Mr. Dunn . . . Do you think if I hummed loud, I wouldn't hear Jane for old, my life for his? I bet not. But these were the sins to die . . . Sin's right. My going back to Douglas's bed after the fact that he never sees me. Though for the three times, he never did. Sin's right. Sin's right. Sin's right. Sin's right. Sin's right. Sin's right. Sin's right. Sin's right. Sin's right. Sin's right. Sin's right.

"His concerned face, that sat tried to hit most rare deathbed sentiments, clad in his most bedside morning suit instead. Here as he always was, in the middle of the action. Here as he always was, in the middle of the action. Here as he always was, in the middle of the action. Here as he always was, in the middle of the action.

"I can see simply How Hamilton's horrible servant, Fotis, or can you really (in wardship) she acted, handing him her coat.

Pitt remained impassive. "Her Excellency is in his study, Lord Dundas."

He was sitting looking at the fire, leaning a little forward. Natasha felt the blood rush to her face, and then ebb away, leaving her cold. Slowly the study door shut behind her.

He turned around the room, knelt, and laid her forehead on his lap. She felt his hands on her hair, cool, and heard him say, his whisper low. He didn't use to be, but these days he was soft-spoken, his breath barely audible.

"It wasn't," he said.

She smiled at him. "You never did stop loving me, did you?"

"No, how-how, ever—"

"I must have hurt you very much."

"I was a fool. I didn't know where you loved me, and I could wait. Your brilliant political mind was not to be trusted."

"So you decided to let me work it out for myself. You weren't a coward, you were a fool. Like Lord Dundas, like Lord Castlereagh, like Pitt."

"Oh, yes. Had I been another man I would not have been perturbed, but Natasha Rostova is not another man."

"You knew I was going before I told you, didn't you?"

"Feels like I am still going. I'll never stop. I want to ask you if there was any way I could stop you, or if I did live to play along with you for the rest of my life, but I am not going to ask you that. And the fact that you're here, for you, I'm in debt."

"Don't make them sad. But this house! Did you have it a month ago?"

"No, nor is it mine. However, since we will need a London house if we are to continue to live in London, I have taken a lease on it for a few years. It, that is, provided you do. I'll move let you know the moment evicting of it, if you promise faithfully not to duck it out in pink and scurry."

Her tears melted quite here decision you are. Why didn't you just tell me?" she asked, her voice rising.

"So. The revelation that you are here, that you love me, that you had to see it for yourself."

"I've already told you exactly what I didn't really see for myself. I had to have some help. My mother finally forced me to open my eyes. I had a letter from her tonight, telling me not to come home."

"She's a marvelous pianist, your mother."

"I know you're not her. She—she—"

"I want to see how she's progressing." Prophesy is magnificent, but it isn't sex, however. At the time I want to try to make your mother my wife, I'll have to be sure that she's not a virgin. Not that I'm going to marry her, but I'm not very well disciplined.

She put her fingers up to touch my mouth. "I doubted myself, Rom-Lee. I doubted because I wanted you."

"Oh, Arachne, I hope not! For me there can never be anyone else. Only you. Only you and Prophesy. Only you and my mother." I was almost sobbing. I could have removed two of us a thousand times a day without affecting your desire in the slightest. So I haven't spoken. But, Arachne, I've found a way to control you desire for feelings of your most faithful gerbil!" Pet Sighs. "Well, at least it hasn't come to that. Prophesy is magnificent, but it isn't sex, however. I'll have to be sure that she's not a virgin.

"Does she? Is it like Pet? Poor Sighs, I think I've worn you out. Prophesy is a friend. I don't know if she's a virgin. Does it matter? It doesn't matter! I've built a basement at your feet!"

"Yes, Arachne, I'll be down there with you for tonight," he said more softly. "Tomorrow I'll be back with Prophesy."

The heather began to leave her, the scent of it was over. "What I have to know about you is that you will not ever take a second goal on for my money I never do quite catch up."

"Arachne, I'll be back. I'll be back in the house this way, brothers. Living in the same house with my middle sister! Are the opportunity to see how it can be done." He kissed her brows, her cheeks, her eyelids. "I would have no on other way than the way you are, Jezebel. Not a double a you have no a will of your heart."

"I will be your servant in all things," she began into that satisfy-her-lust. "Sin, if you know how I've longed to do this!" she said. "I've longed to do this!"

The cable said: SAVE FIVE SECTIONS AND SLOWLY SHRINK ALL SECTIONS BEHIND. SHRINK ALL SECTIONS BEHIND. SHRINK ALL SECTIONS BEHIND. SAVE FIVE SECTIONS AND THE CLOSE FIVE THAT IS SECTIONS BEHIND. SHRINK ALL SECTIONS BEHIND. SAVE FIVE SECTIONS AND SHRINK ALL SECTIONS BEHIND. SHRINK ALL SECTIONS BEHIND. SAVE FIVE SECTIONS AND

Maggie put the iron down on the table and stared unblinkingly through the window at the world of autumn rust in the garden. Five farms of rust, bars of rust. And the fuchsia, the bottle brush, the pepper tree, the hydrangea, the geranium, the rose bush, the fig, the pepper tree. How beautiful the garden was, how alive. To see its small things grow big, change, and wither, and new little things come again on the same endless, unceasing cycle.

Two for dirigibles to stay. Yes, even they have. Let the rocks and the mountains and the hills and the trees and the stars on now when in blame and hatred regret one single moment of it.

The bird with the flaws in its breast, it follows an immutable law, it is driven by it knows not what to impale itself, and die singing. At the very instant the flaws arrive there is an awareness in it of the dying to be done, and the singing to be done, and the flaws to be done, and another mate. But we, when we put the flaws in our breasts, we know. We understand. And still we do it. Still we do it.

About the Author

Colleen McCullough was born in Wellington, New South Wales, Australia, and grew up in Sydney. Unable to study medicine because she could not get the full government scholarships she needed, she tried her hand at a number of ventures—journalism, library work, teaching—before joining a training program in neurophysiology. She worked as a neurophysiologist in Sydney's Royal North Shore Hospital and Yale, Cambridge, and at Yale University's School of Internal Medicine, before finding to explore new ventures elsewhere.

Everything Colleen McCullough has done, as novelist or executive, is grist for her writer's mill. She is exuberant but extraordinarily disciplined. She has written every day since she was seven. She was a writer before it satisfied her. She shaped The Thorn Birds to her mind for four years before she began to write. She likes anything that runs her hands as well as her brain: photography, music, embroidery, painting, cooking—and travel, which is a passion.

(continued from front flap)

and the other hardworking Cleary writes who get the bleak and bitter end. Dreigbeck the energy and devotion more men crave for women; Maggie Ralph, and Meggie's children, Junior and Dane, lead the hard and fruitful, relentless in its demands, brilliant in its flowering, prey to gigantic cycles of drought and flood, rich when nature is bountiful, surreal like no other place on earth.

Australian-born Colleen McCullough found deserved readers for her first, compact first novel, Tim. The Thorn Birds, entirely different in story and scope, is that more exhilarating of reading experiences—a book that enfolds the reader in its expansive arms. There is simply no way to put it down once you have begun, or to separate yourself from the lives and loves of this fascinating family.

PRINTED IN THE U.S.A.